Government is mingled with their own money. They would have no just claim on the Government to have whatever balance might stand at the credit of the Government refunded to them. And that is precisely this case. This postmaster was, of course, called upon from day to day to meet certain requirements on his office as a money-order office. He kept the money of the Government mingled with his own money, just as a man who is the administrator of an estate would keep the money of the estate with his own money and invested with his own funds. But he could not keep out just that amount, if robbed, and say the estate of which he was administrator should suffer the loss and not himself at all. This was mingled with his own private funds, and he should suffer the loss as any banker in similar circumstances would.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Until last Congress the law prohibited postmasters from depositing in a bank. They were bound to keep their money in this way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If I understand this case it is this—and I desire to call the attention of the House for one moment to it: The postmaster has a safe in his post-office, and the Department in important post-offices furnishes the safes. Now, he puts his own money in the safe, and the Government money in the same safe. Is that a mingling of the money at all? They are probably in different parts of the safe. He is bound to keep a sum of money in the safe sufficient to meet the money-orders of which he is advised; and most postmasters use their own money for that purpose, so as to be sure and never have a money-order fail.

Well, now, that safe is robbed. The Government money is taken, and the postmaster's own money is taken. The fact that he has a larger sum of his own money than he has of the Government money takes away all thought that there was collusion on his part with the robbers. He would not have had his own money there if there had been. And the fact that he lost a larger sum is evidence of his probity, honesty, and propriety of conduct. Now, he does not ask the Government to reimburse him his own money, although for aught I know it was taken out of a Government safe, furnished by the Government. It might have been. But he simply asks that the Government shall not call upon him to pay that money, of which he has taken the same high care that a man takes of his own money.

Mr. SPEER. If I understand it, however, the fact of the robbery, as well as the fact of the amount of money stolen, rests for proof alone on the ex parte affidavit of the party interested. Now, had this man a clerk? If he had, what does he say? How do you get at the amount?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. From the books as they were made up at night—both private and public books—and verified by the clerk, a third person.

Mr. SPEER. Does that appear in the case?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. SPEER. I understood it to rest entirely on the affidavit of the postmaster.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no. But if you knew him I am sure you would be willing to rest on his affidavit.

Mr. SPEER. I am not saying anything about the integrity of the postmaster. I am simply discharging a public duty, without reflecting on anybody.

Mr. COX. I wish to say a word about this matter as a precedent. If the facts be as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and if this man took the same care of the Government money as of his own, he ought to be relieved. I think that is fair.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. The affidavit is very clear on that point.

Mr. COX. There are many cases of this kind. I had one myself before the Committee on Foreign Affairs yesterday.

The question being taken on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Claims, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I wish to say that a number of bills of this character have come before the Committee on Claims, and some of them have been reported this morning; and it has been the practice of that committee to address the Post-Office Department for the purpose of asking what amount of stamps was on hand at the time the robbery was committed, and also what amount of money-order funds. I know nothing of the facts here, whether any information on this point has been presented to the House or not. But the Post-Office Department can make a very accurate statement of the amount of funds probably on hand at a given date. By taking the postmaster's last quarterly account of the sales made each day they can arrive approximately at the amount of funds he has on hand.

Then it is the business of the postmaster himself, and of course of the Department, to keep an account of the money-order fund, so that the money-order office of the Post-Office Department can tell what amount of money is on hand at the close of any given day of the money-order fund.

It has been the practice of the Committee on Claims to secure from the Department this information before passing bills of this class. I suggest this as a very simple method of obtaining the necessary information in reference to these bills.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I wish to say that two other members of Congress, who have resided in the district I now represent, have examined into this matter, and were fully satisfied, both by inquiries at the Department and of the detectives in Boston, that the claim is a just one. One of those gentlemen, Mr. Estes, lived in the town of Framingham, and was conversant with everything connected with the case. Both of those gentlemen have told me that there is not a shadow of doubt as to the justice of this claim.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Has it been investigated by a post-office agent?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. It has been, and has been reported on favorably. The claim is entirely just in every respect, and I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. MORGAN.

The next bill reported by the committee was the bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

L. S. CAMPBELL.

The next bill reported from the committee was the bill (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. DENNISTON.

The next bill reported from the committee was the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William H. Denniston, late acting lieutenant of cavalry, Company D, Seventh New York Volunteers.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM E. PRINCE.

The next bill reported from the committee was the bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa.

Mr. PARSONS. I think, sir, that bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

Mr. RUSK. No, sir; the bill was not amended in the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS BARNARD.

The next bill reported from the committee was the bill (H. R. No. 1226) granting a pension to Francis Barnard.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZA A. MAXHAM.

The next bill reported from the committee was the bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY STORRS.

The next bill reported from the committee was the bill (H. R. No. 1228) granting a pension to Mary Storrs, reported with an amendment to provide that the pension shall take effect from the date of the passage of the act.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH R. M'CRACKEN.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 1229) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. McCracken.

The Committee of the Whole recommend that the bill be amended so that the pension shall date from the passage of the act.

Mr. SMALL. I do not know upon what ground it is proposed to deny to these people several years of pension. I was not present during the consideration of these bills by the Committee of the Whole. In regard to these cases I will say that many of them have for a long time been before the Commissioner of Pensions. There has been no neglect on the part of the petitioners that should deprive them now of having their pensions date back to the time of the death of the persons or the date of the disabilities, merely because of some technicality which led the Commissioner to think that a bill should be passed by Congress. I do not know what rule the House is disposed to adopt—certainly not an equitable one—if they propose to cut off these old people from pensions as honestly due as though granted years ago.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I was one of several who called attention to this bill at the time it was likely to pass in the Committee of the Whole, and inquired if it was proper to have a clause inserted making the pension begin at the date of the death of the soldier. I did so, saying at the same time that I did not propose to pass upon the abstract justice of so dating back the pension. But it seemed to me that the bill was likely to pass without due consideration, and I wished to call the attention of members to the fact that such had not been the usage of Congress. I suppose the Government grants these pensions in order to provide for the present and future support of the pensioners. The pensioner applies to Congress for a pension upon the ground that it is needed for future support, and it is so granted. As I understand, that is the way we have always legislated. This House has taken a different course sometimes; but the other branch of Congress has always pursued the course I have indicated.

I think it might be just to let the pension begin with the date of the application; there would be something of reason in that, though if the pension be granted solely to provide for future support that reason would not apply. We are now paying something like $30,000,000 a year for pensions. A very large number of the pensions have been granted during the last four, five, or six years. I take it that in the majority of cases the pension-list will show that the pensions began one, two, or three years after the death of the soldier. Now, if you adopt the rule proposed in this case, why would it not be equitable for every pensioner who heretofore has had a pension granted dating from the application or the date of grant to come here for back pension? If we consider it an honorable debt, a debt of patriotism toward these people, I have nothing to say, whether it costs us one hundred, two hundred, or five hundred million dollars. But I should very much doubt whether one hundred millions would be sufficient to satisfy the claimants under the principle advocated by the gentleman in regard to this bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. In addition to what is suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] I wish to say that, as I understand the pension laws, a pension is allowed by the Department from the date of the allowance, and not from the date of the disability. If that is the case, the party who comes to Congress for relief and has his pension date back to the date of the disability is placed in a better position than when he applied to the Department. It has not been the case, so far as my knowledge goes, that any law passed by Congress permitted pensions to date back beyond the passage of the act.

Mr. RUSK. That has been done in a great many cases.

Mr. BURCHARD. Sometimes by the House, but not by Congress.

Mr. RUSK. Since limitations have been placed upon pensions by general law they have run back only to the time of the application.

Mr. STORM. The report of the Commissioner of Pensions last year shows that the amount paid for pensions last year was greater than any other year in the history of the Government. That, of course, was largely due to the action of this body. It is now time for us to consider whether we will go on with this sort of legislation, increasing the pension list by acts of this kind. I think we should lay it down as a rule to govern us in the future that we will in no case go back of the date of the act.

Mr. SPEER. Meritorious cases are provided for and governed by general law. It is only in those cases where a pension cannot be granted under the general law that they come here. All pensions granted under the general law begin from the issuing of the certificate allowing the pension.

Mr. RUSK. From the date of application.

Mr. SPEER. Or from the time the final proof is filed. Yet here in less meritorious cases it is proposed that the pension shall go back further, thereby giving to rejected claimants, to those that cannot pass through the Pension Office, a preference of five or ten years over more meritorious claimants.

Mr. SMALL. What does the gentleman mean by meritorious claimants? Are these not all meritorious?

Mr. SPEER. I mean those claimants who are embraced and governed by general law. When a claim comes here it is one not embraced in the provisions of the general law. There may be some special equity in it which should move Congress to pass a special bill allowing a pension in that particular case.

But what I want to say is this: if Congress is willing to go back in all these cases, and if the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is able to bear such an expenditure, then we should adopt some general provision which shall secure that result. But from my experience as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the last House, I say to the friends of these special bills that they injure instead of benefiting the cause of the soldiers or the widows whom they are trying to serve by providing in their bills that the pension shall date from the time of the death or the incurring of disability. For so surely as any bill passes this House in that form the provision will be struck out in the Senate; the bill may come back here at a late day, and will probably fail from want of time for its consideration. Every man who undertakes to secure the passage of a bill in that form inflicts an injury rather than confers a benefit upon the worthy claimants whom he is endeavoring to serve.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 59, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SMALL and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 56.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. RUSK. I give notice that I accept the adoption of this amendment as an instruction from the House to the Committee on Invalid Pensions to antedate no more pensions.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH W. PRINDLE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, deceased.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, late a sergeant in Company D, Fifth Ohio Volunteers, and to pay her a pension for said minors from the date of filing her application for such pension.

The bill was reported, with an amendment striking out the words "filing her application for such pension," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDMUND M. RANDOLPH.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 191) to provide for the payment of legal services rendered by Edmund M. Randolph to the United States.

The SPEAKER. This bill is reported back with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to fix the amount. If there be no objection the order will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. All the reports from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar have now been disposed of.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FRYE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the original papers in Miscellaneous Document No. 169, second session Forty-second Congress, and Report No. 94, third session Forty-second Congress, for use in the Treasury Department, no adverse report having been made in the case.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, presented a preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of working men and women held in the city of Philadelphia, on the 11th instant, against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and urging more stringent provisions; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. HAYS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to pay John G. Stokes the regular compensation as clerk of the Committee on Agriculture from the time he actually entered upon duty as such, notwithstanding his failure to be sworn in until a late day.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH CHINA.

Mr. PACKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back a letter from the Postmaster-General, in reply to a resolution of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, transmitting copies of all papers and correspondence relating to the additional monthly service on the China line authorized by sections 3 and 6 of the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1873; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

FORT SAINT PHILIP CANAL.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals a bill (H. R. No. 1232) to provide for the construction of the Fort Saint Philip Canal, in the State of Louisiana, and its maintenance as a national public highway; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

B. F. FARRELL.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President, if not incompatible with the public service, be requested to furnish this House with copies of the papers in the case of B. F. Farrell, late United States consul at Cadiz, Spain, who was instrumental in exposing the frauds on the revenue by certain Spanish wine merchants and their agents.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. ARMSTRONG, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print some remarks he had prepared on House bill No. 208, in relation to the Dakota Indian war claims of 1862. [See Appendix.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WOODFORD until the 26th, and to Mr. BARRY for fourteen days.

The SPEAKER. The House will be as in Committee of the Whole to-morrow for the purpose of debate only, Mr. RUSK in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

And then (at twenty minutes to four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The following post-route bill was introduced under the rule, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

By Mr. CLEMENTS: A bill to establish a post-route from Anna, Illinois, to Vienna, Illinois.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 17, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

On motion of Mr. BECK the reading of the Journal of yesterday was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RUSK in the chair.) The House meets to-day, as in Committee of the Whole, for debate only; no business whatever to be transacted.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, there has not been, nor can there be, any measure proposed to this House of more vital importance to the peace, good order, prosperity, and happiness of the people of the South than the one now under consideration. And, while I fear that neither right, reason, argument, nor persuasion will avail to defeat it, I feel it a duty which I owe to both races of my State to exhaust every legitimate expedient in my power to avert from them the unprecedented calamities that must necessarily ensue upon the adoption of this bill.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the provisions of the bill in their constitutional bearings; that has been already exhaustively done by abler hands, and its unconstitutionality demonstrated conclusively to all unprejudiced minds. It is its enforcement, and the practical results that are to follow this and all kindred legislation, that we so much deplore. And it is to this that I address myself, and ask the calm, deliberate attention of the friends of the bill. For, after all, the effect which any legislation is to have upon the country constitutes the great question for the consideration and control of the true statesman. Whether this measure is constitutional or not, the dominant party on this floor so contend; and I fear that they have both the power and the will to impose it upon the country, unless they can be made to pause and consider long enough to foresee the direful consequences which must inevitably follow. To those who contend for its constitutionality I have this to say: that the great apostle to the Gentiles said, "All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient."

Distinguished advocates of this bill on the other side of the House justify their support of the measure on the ground and seem to feel that it is demanded for the protection of the freedmen of the South, because of the prejudices that exist in the minds of the white people against the colored race. Now let me assure you, sir, with all the candor, honesty, and emphasis of which I am capable, that a greater delusion than this never seized upon the minds of rational, intelligent men. Why, sir, we have not now, and never had, any grounds of prejudice against the colored man. On the contrary, our prepossessions and sympathies have always been with him, whether in a condition of servitude or freedom. Such is the natural result of our education, association, and interest. The property interest we once had in him was of itself a humanizing influence, in so far as it led the white man to care for him in sickness and in health—in body and in soul. It was, sir, this influence that secured to him that constant daily contact and association with the white man that raised him from his rude, barbaric state to the status of civilization and development in which emancipation found him. And, no matter what may be said of the abuses of slavery, they were mere incidents, and do not invalidate the great truth thus enunciated. It is a fact alike undenied and undeniable. In their former state they were our property; in their present position of freedom they are still our laborers in the field and our principal dependents in our families and our homes.

A moment's serious reflection, honest and apart from blind, partisan zeal and the infatuation of fanaticism, will satisfy every unprejudiced mind that pecuniary interest alone would impel our people not only to protect and provide for the freedmen, but by every possible means within their power to educate and elevate them to a proper appreciation of the grave responsibilities and privileges growing out of their new relation of citizenship, not only to society and government, but to ourselves and our families. In an agricultural region the mutual dependence and reciprocity of interest which always exist between the capitalist and the laborer, the landlord and the tenant, could not do otherwise than beget and preserve feelings of amity, justice, and a kindly consideration between them. It is no disparagement to the masses of the colored people of the South to say that they know, feel, and acknowledge their dependence upon the white man, not only for employment, but for counsel, sympathy, and protection. On the other hand, the white man daily exhibits his need of the black man as a laborer, and knows full well that the more happy and contented he makes him, the more reliable and profitable he becomes. And hence, sir, the white man of the South is to-day, and has ever been, ready, willing, nay anxious, to accord to the colored race every right, privilege, and immunity, social and political, that would be conducive to his interest and happiness, and at the same time compatible with good government, peace, and order. That this statement is true is proven by the fact that there is not to be found, so far as my knowledge extends, a single statute in any of the former slave States that discriminates against any citizen thereof "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." On the contrary, our State constitutions, and all the laws enacted under them, have been made to conform in all respects to the requirements of the Constitution of the United States as amended. The same constitution that protects the white man throws its broad ægis around the colored man. The same law that inflicts punishment for crime upon one citizen applies to each and every one alike, be he white or black, rich or poor, high or low. The same privileges and immunities are granted to, and are to-day enjoyed and exercised by, each and every citizen without "let or hinderance." And if there be any discriminations in the judicial administration and execution of the laws, I know nothing of them. What more, I ask, can be justly demanded, either by the letter, spirit, or genius of a republican government?

The Southern States were told that when their constitutions and laws were made to conform to the Constitution of the United States the work of reconstruction was consummated, and that there would be no further interference with the rights of the States by the Federal Government. They in good faith accepted the assurance, and have in all respects complied with the obligations thus imposed, and they to-day ask that you——

Mr. RAINEY. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. Excuse me; I do not wish to be interrupted, as my time is limited.

Mr. RAINEY. I will not interrupt you again, if you answer this question. Are not the citizens of your State now calling a convention to set aside that constitution, and to get up another one?

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. In reply to this question I will say, that no movement for a constitutional convention in my State contemplates any change in the existing relations of the two races or the restriction in any way of the rights growing out of these relations.

Our own people, seeing at an early day the dangers and difficulties that would arise by any attempt even upon their own part to control a question so delicate and at the same time so complex, wisely and promptly provided against its agitation in their organic law. And their wisdom, prudence, and true statesmanship, responsive to the deliberate conviction of the citizens themselves, will say, let it remain forever. Not only would we have it thus for our own domestic tranquillity and happiness, but for the honor and weal of the nation.

Will the party in power with equal fidelity fulfill their obligations? To do this you have only to let us alone, and thereby permit us to regulate our internal interests according to the dictates of our own judgments, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. As it regards the social status of her citizens, the State of Georgia, which I have the honor in part to represent, has long ago spoken in language alike intelligible and unmistakable. The eleventh section of her present constitution, adopted in 1868, provides that "the social status of the citizen shall never be the subject of legislation." That constitution was framed by a convention composed almost exclusively of delegates who belonged to the republican party, and many of whom were colored men. And that constitution was submitted to, and approved by, the American Congress, then as now largely republican. It was ratified by the citizens of the State, and is to-day one of the fundamental principles of our government. And now let me ask, will this Congress, unmindful of the approval which a previous Congress has already given to the settlement of this vexed question, reopen Pandora's box of ills, and thereby impose upon the people of Georgia, and her sister Southern States, and their unoffending citizens of both races, the dreaded calamities which they sought to shield themselves from by the very highest possible safeguard? Will you who control the legislation of the nation be so unwise as to attempt to regulate by congressional enactment the social status of the citizens of the States, when the people themselves have declared their unwillingness to touch it, by placing it beyond the reach of the legislative arm of their own State?

I cannot and will not permit myself to believe that you will indulge such folly and madness until the deed itself is done. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that a very large majority of the republican members of this House do not understand the true condition of affairs in the South. For if they did, and are sincere in their avowals of solicitude for the welfare of the country, and especially for the prosperity and advancement of the colored race, I am very sure that they would indicate it in some better way than the adoption of legislative enactments which, in my judgment, when tried, will not only prove unacceptable to the masses of colored people at the South, but alike destructive of the harmony and great interests of both races. In the short time allowed me I cannot farther discuss this branch of the subject, but will briefly review one other of its aspects.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, known to all, that previous to emancipation a very large proportion of the wealth of the South consisted of her then slave property. This wealth, vast as it was, by the war and its results was entirely swept away, leaving the industrial pursuits of the country disorganized and prostrate. Superadded to this was an influx into our midst of a horde of adventurers, who, feeling no identity of interest with government of any sort, either Federal or State, with no respect for the rights of the white man or regard for the welfare of the colored man, ignoring the former and subsidizing the latter, with hearts intent upon plunder alone, sought to array the colored man, if not in a deadly conflict of races against the white man, at least of interest. And such was their success for a while that it was exceedingly difficult to contract with laborers at any price and upon any terms. The result was that very many of our best citizens, men of enterprise and energy, despairing of ever being able to reconcile the conflicting elements thus aroused, abandoned their former homes and farms, and sought the means of subsistence for themselves and families elsewhere, in different and more uncongenial pursuits. And thus this state of things continued to grow worse and worse—plunder, on the one hand, by carpet-bag rulers, and, on the other, the disorganization of our labor system—until a stern necessity seemed to demand and to inaugurate a change. And now, just as we are beginning to emerge from the storm-cloud which has so long overshadowed us, just as its fury is beginning somewhat to abate, you propose to renew our conflicts and difficulties by imposing upon us measures still more odious to the people of both races than any hitherto inflicted. Stop, sirs, in your further crusade of wrong and madness upon the rights of the States, before you find it too late to retrieve the ruin which your hands have wrought.

I have, Mr. Speaker, been a planter all my life; have owned many slaves, most of whom are my tenants to-day, and have been ever since they were emancipated. I know the disposition and character of the negro race, their wants, necessities, and adaptations. I am their friend; they feel it and acknowledge it. I am ready to do anything that will ameliorate and improve their condition, for in doing it I am sensible of the fact that I will thereby promote the material prosperity of the whole country. But I say to the friends of this measure that if I were the direst enemy of the colored man, and desired to depress him in the scale of human intelligences; nay, if my purpose was to exterminate him from the earth, I would ask no surer or speedier means of accomplishing that end than the enactment and practical enforcement of just such measures as these embodied in this "civil-rights" bill, the effect of which is to estrange him from, and to antagonize him to, the white man. Our people, prompted alike by the considerations of humanity and interest, would avert any such calamity. In almost every village and in many neighborhoods of the South the freedmen have schools of their own. These schools are supported in part by the States—by the voluntary contributions of the white people, supplemented by such amounts as the freedmen themselves can spare from their scanty earnings.

Georgia to-day is struggling hard to establish a general system of public education for all her people, black as well as white. This great work cannot be accomplished in a day or in a year. With our impoverished resources, and the interferences and discouragements with which we have had to contend, the great astonishment is that we have accomplished anything at all in that direction. Our colored population seems content with what we have done and are still doing for them, and feel that they are making some advancement toward securing educational privileges. Let us alone, and we will do for them and ourselves the very best that we can with the limited resources at our command. Pass this bill and you entail upon us still further discouragements and confusions, which will not only undo what we have already accomplished in building up a general system of common schools for both races alike, but you will thereby restrict our beneficence and compel us to inaugurate still another and more partial system. This remark is not intended as a threat, nor has it any of the feelings or spirit of vindictiveness in it. Threats are the weapons of cowardice, and vindictiveness finds a place only in malignant hearts. But I will say that if it be the object of this bill to compel the association of the two races in schools, churches, hotels, burial grounds, public conveyances, or anywhere else, that its purposes will never be accomplished. The common sense of the black man forbids him to aspire to it, and the self-respect and taste of the white man revolt at the thought and will never tolerate it. The associations of men in social life have ever been, and will always be, voluntary—prompted by either taste or interests, or by both combined. It is true that political power, intensified and concentrated for its own aggrandizement, may accomplish much in modifying and even in overthrowing forms of government. But in the utmost stretch of that power, it can never repeal or annul the laws of God. And hence, sir, we at the South have no fears of social equality, although its enforcement should be attempted by the strong arm of Government in the most positive and direct legislation. The inherent rights and instincts which a wise and beneficent Creator has implanted in the breast and stamped upon the brow of the Anglo-Saxon race, and which adheres to him in every country, clime, and condition of earth, as God's own signet of superiority, forbids it. It is not this fear that impels us to oppose so strenuously the passage of this and of all similar bills; but it is because the settlement of all such questions rightfully belongs to us, and we know that we can dispose of them better than you can. We see, and have already sorely felt, the consequences of such interference with our internal rights and regulations. We ask nothing for ourselves, individually or as States, that we do not freely accord to you and to your States.

If the States themselves have not the right to regulate all such matters as those embodied in the provisions of this "civil-rights bill," let me ask in all candor what subject involving the status and rights of citizenship is left within their own control and beyond the reach of Federal legislation? Have the States no reserved rights? If they are without rights, then they are no longer States. Take their rights away, as you propose to do in this bill, and you at once establish a precedent upon which the Congress can at will transform the sovereign States of the Union into mere provisional dependencies. You have but to take a few more steps in this direction and you will have obliterated the very principle, the sovereignty of the States, from which the Federal Government itself derived its vitality and power.

Mr. Speaker, when slavery was abolished we hoped and felt that the great "apple of discord" was forever removed from the councils of the nation; that with the reconstruction of the Government would come the restoration of peace and fraternity; that men of all parties, from every portion of the Union, would come together in a spirit of mutual concord and conciliation, and address themselves with equal earnestness to the great work of repairing the sad desolations of war, and the development of the vast resources of our common country. But alas! alas! how great the delusion. We of the South, amid our impoverishment and ruin, still find ourselves a prey to oppression and wrong. Will this strife never cease? Will the day never come when moderation, justice, and equality shall obtain, and when we, as a people of a common country and a common destiny, can dwell together in unity? Let those who are in power and who control the affairs of Government answer. The people of the South were honest rebels, (if, indeed, rebels at all,) and are no less to-day American citizens, loyal in every sentiment of their nature to the true principles of constitutional liberty, as taught by the fathers of the Republic. And they will emulate the most ardent in preserving and transmitting to their children that priceless boon. Hence, sir, we can never lend our voices or our votes to the support of any measure which, like the "civil-rights bill," destroys the equilibrium of our Federal system by invading the sovereignty of the States, and thereby denying to the people that very "domestic tranquillity" which it was instituted to promote.

CONVERTIBLE CURRENCY BONDS WILL GIVE ELASTICITY TO OUR CURRENCY, AND ARE ESSENTIAL TO A SYSTEM OF INCONVERTIBLE PAPER.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, it will be well, before proceeding to the details of the discussion of to-day, to take a summary view of the condition of the country. The story of our victories over the forces of nature, the development of our resources, our accumulations of wealth and its division among the people, attested by increased deposits in savings banks, and the greatly increased number of free holders among the laboring classes during the last eight years, is unparalleled in history, and if fitly told would read like a story of oriental imagination. Yet, sir, we are in the midst of bankruptcy. Great local and national enterprises have been arrested or abandoned, the fires of the forge and the furnace have gone out, and the loom and spindle are silent. Hundreds of thousands of frugal and industrious people are unemployed and eating the bitter bread of charity; and the Government, alarmed at the sudden decrease of its revenues, abandons its hope of persistent reduction of the public debt, and demands the restoration of war taxes.

What cause was sufficient to instantly arrest the grandeur of our movements and effect a change which was as all-pervading as it was sudden? Had the Almighty manifested His displeasure by sending pestilence and famine to sweep the land; had earthquakes swallowed up our great manufacturing and commercial centers; or had war devastated our fields and filled the land with widows, orphans, and destitution? No. Our crops of grain, tobacco, and cotton were far above the average, and in unusual demand; our miners had been industriously at work; and the mines; whether of the precious or the useful metals, had yielded ample returns for the labor expended on them; our manufacturing productions in no nine successive months had ever equaled those of the first three-quarters of last year; our exports were increasing in an unprecedented ratio; and the steadily increasing volume of immigration attested the unequaled prosperity of the United States; and we can ascribe the want and suffering that pervade the land to none of the causes I have indicated. To find their source we must study the history of our financial legislation since the close of the war in 1865. And here we will find an ample cause for the commercial revulsion that is costing us so many thousands of millions of dollars and blighting the hopes of a generation.

Like causes produce like effects, and history repeats herself with marvelous accuracy of detail whenever legislation gives like conditions to eras.

Sir, he who had read Sir Archibald Alison's England in 1815 and 1845, or, a Sufficient and a Contracted Currency, and had noted the absolute parallel between her history for the first years of the Napoleonic wars and those immediately preceding them, and the same years of our war for the suppression of the rebellion and preceding it; the forced suspension of specie payments in both countries; the unequal resources of the Government, and the unprecedented prosperity of the people in each country in spite of the calamities and expenses of war during the period in which gold was demonetized and inconvertible paper money, based on the public credit and issued in unprecedented volume, was legal tender and the current money of the country; the contraction of the currency of England in obedience to legislation dictated by the creditor class and dealers in bullion and credit; the almost universal bankruptcy of merchants and manufacturers, and the long and fearful sufferings of the people; the exhaustion of the exchequer; the abandonment of the sinking fund, and the restoration of war taxes in times of peace, all of which followed with lightning speed the forced resumption of specie payments, could doubt that the same consequences must inevitably follow the arbitrary contraction of our currency? It needed but the commercial crash of September to make the parallel complete in all its details, and demonstrate the fact that our sufferings are the fruits of unwise and unpatriotic legislation, and have been brought upon us by yielding to the demands of the creditor class and theorists who seem to believe that wisdom died and experience lost the power to teach when the bullion report of 1811 was made to the British Parliament. Ignoring the lessons of intervening history—refusing to examine the causes which led to the crises of 1837 and 1840 and 1857, when our currency was on what is called a gold basis, and have thrice compelled the government of England to permit the bank to violate the law restricting its issues—they have raised the cry of "On to specie payments!" and overwhelmed the country in disasters too great to be characterized by speaking of them as a financial Bull Run. I could not tell in what month or in what particular year the catastrophe would come, but the action of Congress and the Treasury Department in 1866 convinced me that it was inevitable and all unheeded by a majority of either House, or by the then Administration. On January 3, 1867, I raised my warning voice in this Hall and said:

The greenbacks are, it is true, part of our debt, and must therefore at some day be redeemed; but they are the only part of our immense debt which bears no interest; and while there are outstanding, as the Secretary's statement of December 1, 1866, shows, $147,387,140 of compound-interest notes which are currency and used as such by the national banks, and $699,933,750 of three-years' notes bearing 7.3 per cent. interest, all of which were purchased in a greatly depreciated currency, I cannot comprehend the philosophy which proposes to let the interest on these run, while absorbing a non-interest-bearing loan which the people cherish as furnishing the best currency for our immense domestic commerce they have ever had.

Having said thus much I added a prediction, and described the condition of the country as it came to be in last October, and is now, as graphically as I could describe it to you to-day with the events of the past months fresh in my mind, and the groans of the suffering people filling my ears. Let me read it:

The experiment, if attempted as a means of hastening specie payments, will prove a failure, but not a harmless one. It will be fatal to the prospects of a majority of the business men of this generation, and strip the frugal laboring people of the country of the small but hard-earned sums they have deposited in savings banks or invested in Government securities. It will make money scarce and employment uncertain. Its object is to reduce the amount of that which in every part of our country and for the hundreds of thousands of millions of dollars of domestic trade is money, and to increase its purchasing power; and by thus unsettling values to paralyze trade, suspend production, and deprive industry of employment. It will make the money of the rich man more valuable and deprive the poor man of his entire capital, the value of his labor, by depriving him of employment. Its first effect will be to increase the rate of interest and diminish the rate of wages, and its final effect wide-spread bankruptcy and a more protracted suspension of specie payments.

I ask gentlemen whether experience and observation will enable any of them to perfect the picture presented seven years ago of what must be the inevitable consequences of contracting the currency of a people who dwell in the midst of boundless resources, and whose energies are impelled by the inspiration of freedom to engage in grand enterprises for individual and public good.

I then proceeded to say:

Anxious as the people are to relieve the country of the evils entailed upon it by the war, and willing as they have proven themselves to endure any privations or sacrifices required by the exigencies of the country, they will not consent to an experiment involving such terrible consequences for the purpose of paying the Indiana and other banks, which hold and use as part of their reserve our compound-interest notes, two dollars for every one they invested in this interest-bearing portion of our "lawful money." Much as banks, bankers, and speculators in Government securities may approve this policy, the people earnestly and indignantly protest against it.

Neither my voice nor that of the people was heard. The bullion and credit mongers, the holders of a monopoly in currency known as national banks, held the ear of the Government, and succeeded in blasting the prospects of millions of laboring people and of thousands of men of energy, enterprise, and judgment, who have been involved, often without an indiscretion of their own, in a common ruin. Hoping to be more fortunate now than I was then in pressing my convictions upon Congress, I have proposed a bill which, if adopted, will at least stay the hand of ruin, and save from the grasp of the credit and bullion mongers some few of the homes of the working people of the country.

It proposes first to render the country a service, not only important, but which is essential to the stability of trade, namely, to fix the volume of greenbacks. It proposes to fix it at what the law, under which our system of inconvertible paper originated, fixed it at—$400,000,000—not leaving $44,000,000 to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury with which to inflate the currency at one time and to contract it another. By the sudden contraction of $10,000,000 of the currency a financial crisis may be produced; and a system which leaves in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the control of $44,000,000 of currency is fraught with unspeakable danger. My bill proposes to make the volume of the currency $400,000,000, by adding to the $356,000,000 the $44,000,000 retired by Mr. McCulloch, of which $25,000,000 are now in circulation, and the remaining $19,000,000 of which will be required to meet the current expenses of the Government. We must legitimate the reissue of this reserve, or the Secretary of the Treasury may again retire the whole $44,000,000 as soon as the business of the country shall have revived sufficiently to enable him to withdraw it from circulation.

Sir, the measure I have proposed is intended to give steadiness and elasticity to the volume of currency, without inflation or contraction; and, if adopted, will increase the stability of trade and production by preventing the concentration of unemployed currency during the dull seasons of the year, in Wall street, where it is used in promoting speculations in gold, bonds, stocks, and greenbacks themselves. It will enable citizens of the South and West to hold their own balances, and thus create local money centers, by which each populous neighborhood may have its place of deposit and discount, so that at the season of the year when it is necessary to move the crops they can obtain accommodation, without drawing currency from other markets.

[Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.*

Mr. KELLEY. I am here to defend my bill, and will gladly yield for proper questions. I shall, however, consider any question impertinent that is not put to the point on which I am speaking at the time it is put.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My questions relate to the general measure, and the first is whether the promise contained on a greenback, say that the United States will pay to the bearer five dollars, is one which pledges the faith of the United States to pay that amount?

Mr. KELLEY. I am not prepared at this stage of my statement of the objects of my bill to enter into an abstract discussion with the gentleman as to what is a dollar, or as to what method may best be employed to redeem Treasury notes.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My point is this: the gentleman proposes a bill——

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed he will find that I contemplate giving an answer to his question when it properly arises in the course of my remarks. I cannot, at this time, discuss the question of a return to specie payment. I have in my mind an order and method of presenting the features and objects of the bill; and if the gentleman will permit me, I will reach his question in pursuing that order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desired to ask the gentleman at the outset of his remarks (as he is the ablest exponent of the theory he is presenting) the question whether the faith of the Government is pledged to anything in this matter?

Mr. KELLEY. I will accommodate the order of my remarks to the gentleman's question, although I would have preferred that he had allowed me to reach it at another point. Sir, the resolution of 1869, to which the gentleman refers, was passed in order that it might be said that the first act signed by General Grant was a declaration in support of the public credit. It originated in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means, and was a bit of buncombe by which opposition members were to be compelled to vote to sustain the public credit.

A MEMBER. And you voted for it.

Mr. KELLEY. I think every gentleman who was then here voted for it; that our action was unanimous.

You cannot float a great ship in a small pond, nor can you float thousands of millions of debt with a currency inadequate to the daily business of the community. Loans are taken by the current profits of the people. No loans of ours have been taken by the $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 at a time since the banks in combination just after the opening of the war took one or two. They are taken by this process.]

I grieve that I could not have been permitted to pursue my own course of argument; for I find that by allowing myself to be diverted from it I shall run into digressions, and may not be able to get back to my point. I will, therefore, resume and endeavor to explain my bill. But in doing so, permit me to say that I will yield for any question pertinent to the line of argument I am engaged in; but will not be diverted by a question that has no relation to the argument I am making at the time the question is presented.

To proceed, then. The bill next proposes that the Government shall issue bonds, payable, principal and interest, in currency, and bearing a rate of interest of 3.65 per year, or one cent a day, for each one hundred dollars. That will make interest so easy of calculation that the masses of the people can understand it, and calculate it readily. The issue of such bonds will restore to our inconvertible paper system an element essential to its success, and which never was omitted until distinguished American citizens discovered that if the whole debt could be converted into gold-bearing bonds, banking and dealing in American bonds in London would be a speedy way to the accumulation of enormous wealth.

Our credit system began with dependence upon the American people. And in order to enable them to take and hold successive loans there was a steadily increasing volume of temporary loans, payable principal and interest in greenbacks. And we never had any difficulty with our currency until we adopted that system which bound us in chains of gold to the credit mongers of Great Britain and the continent. Until then there was never any difficulty in our system, or any embarrassment or disturbing demand for contraction. These loans gave profitable employment to the surplus capital of the people, and thus limited private speculation.

There is generally an average of about $250,000,000 in this country applicable to temporary loans, which, when not used by the Government, is put on deposit on call, with banks or brokers, at a low rate of interest. There were on the 18th day of September, in the national banks of New York, something like $100,000,000 of deposits on call at a low rate of interest. I have the report of the nine presidents of the associated banks upon the revision of the clearing-house system, and will read a brief extract from it, which, though it is not absolute in the extent of its information, is very significant upon this point. These bank presidents say:

* The passage in brackets is composed of detached and incoherent parts of what was said in the time in which notes were taken by one of the corps of reporters, who, by his want of fidelity, has done grave injustice to the speaker and his interlocutor, W. D. K.

> Deposits which are derived from strictly commercial operations cannot fluctuate so widely from time to time as to produce disturbance in the community, and banks which confine their business to them, as they naturally arise, are always reliable and regular in their treatment of their dealers, and can be conducted with ease and comfort to their managers and safety to the public. On the contrary, deposits which are purchased by payment of interest or otherwise, and which must, therefore, of necessity be largely loaned "on demand," are the cause of continual agitation and solicitude to those who hold them in charge. They are certain to be withdrawn at the season of the year and at the moment most inconvenient to the banks and to their dealers. This fact is best illustrated by the following figures:

The average deposits of the 60 clearing-house banks for ten weeks from July 5 to September 6, were		$232,228,000
The lowest amount reached since the panic was		143,170,000
Showing a total reduction of		89,058,000
Of the above amount, during the ten weeks 12 interest-paying banks held	$111,585,000
The lowest total reached by them since the panic	52,669,000
Showing a loss in 12 banks of		58,916,000
And in the other 48 banks of		30,142,000

> And were it not for the fact that several of the 48 banks are more or less involved in the same practice, this disparity would be still more apparent.

It must be remarked that this relates only to the national banks. When you come to take the amount on deposit on call in the State banks, and with bankers, such as Fisk & Hatch, Howes & Macy, Henry Clews, Jay Cooke & Co., and the horde that failed, and when you come to extend your examination to Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, you will see that there must have been at that time at the very least $200,000,000 of western and southern money, or money from the interior of neighboring States, on deposit at bankers' risk, at low rates of interest, rates so low that those who held it might make profit by reloaning it.

It is to prevent the recurrence of the evils indicated in this report, and which have become but too familiar to us all, that I propose that those who have funds to deposit temporarily may confide them to the Government at a rate of interest that shall be a fair average of the rates paid for such deposits, to wit, between 3 and 4 per cent. "But," inquires some gentleman, "do you propose to make the Government pay interest at the rate of 3.65 for the privilege of holding the moneys of these people?" No, sir; no, sir. I propose this as one step for your redemption and the redemption of the country from the grasp of the bullion and credit mongers of foreign nations, by making it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as fast as possible, to invest the funds derived from the issue of these bonds in gold-bearing 6 per cent. bonds for cancellation.

And gentlemen may as well understand that the question they will have to answer to their constituents, if they refuse to give this proposition a chance for trial, will be, "How do you make 6 per cent. gold paid to foreigners more economical or patriotic than the acceptance of a loan from our own people at 3.65 in paper?" Refuse to allow the American people to loan you hundreds of millions of dollars at a low rate of interest payable in your own paper, and then go to your constituents with an arithmetic prepared to prove that 6 per cent. in gold to foreigners is more economical than 3.65 in paper to Americans, for that is the arithmetical proposition gentlemen will have to meet in the next congressional canvass, unless they shall have put the question out of the way by giving to the greenback a new and profitable service.

And this brings me to the point of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] and I shall be glad to answer his question. I regard the issue of these bonds as a mode of redemption for the greenback by furnishing to the citizen, upon whom, in the language of the bullionists, you have imposed them as a forced loan, a chance to make that loan interest-bearing and active as part of the public funds. I am no less anxious than the gentleman to bring gold and greenbacks to the same value; and when that is done gold will flow in upon us. But how can we do this? Shall we do it by increasing the demand for gold and consequently enhancing its price, and restricting the uses of the greenback, and consequently diminishing its value? They who resist the bill under discussion and its principles pledge themselves to this method of making the greenback convertible.

It must be evident to all that if something is not done quickly to reanimate the productive forces of the country we must increase our loans, and there are already pending propositions before this House and the Senate to increase the gold-bearing loans. We owe now annually, in round figures, $100,000,000 of gold interest; and it is proposed to increase the sum and yet to refuse redemption to the greenback, even in a 3.65 bond; to stamp it as unworthy of the confidence of the Government, and to increase your burden in gold as a means of bringing the greenback you thus repudiate and gold to the same value! When will the result be produced by this method? I do not doubt that gentlemen who propose it are sincere and disinterested, but I fear that others may question their good faith.

Here, then, is one means of redeeming the greenback. Let us now see how we may hope to comply most speedily with the demands of the resolution of 1869. If the people will lend the Government $500,000,000 in greenbacks, with which the Secretary of the Treasury can buy $450,000,000 or more of bonds, we shall owe annually $27,000,000 less of gold, by which the price of gold will be reduced; and the greenback being sure of 3.65 interest when unemployed in strictly commercial uses, will increase in value.

Though the proposition is not involved in my bill, let me say, in passing, that while gentlemen are talking of even mean economies, while they are inquiring into the very anatomy of expenses, and I was going to say doing it with microscopic power, they leave a worse than useless annual expenditure of $20,000,000 of gold unassailed. My bill, as I have said, does not touch this, which is a question for the Committee on Banking and Currency. We pay certain corporations known as banks $20,000,000 of gold annually—for what service? For keeping in circulation by loaning them, and that often at inordinate rates of interest, certain notes, the paper of which was paid for by the Government, the plates for printing which were engraved by the Government, the printing of which was done by and at the expense of the Government; and I cannot see why it would not be wise to simplify our currency by substituting greenbacks, dollar for dollar, for national-bank notes; not to increase the currency, not to issue a dollar more than is afloat now, but to issue a one-dollar greenback in the place of a one-dollar bank-note, a five-dollar greenback for a five-dollar bank-note, a ten-dollar greenback for a ten-dollar bank-note; and so all the way through the range of denominations now in use. As the substitution proceeds the bonds of the national banks should be surrendered to those who own them, and banking will then be free; because the banks, having no circulation, would have no tax on circulation, and be relieved from governmental supervision. That is the only tax they pay to which every private banker or State bank is not subject.

A MEMBER. They pay a tax on deposits.

Mr. KELLEY. No; the only special tax paid by the national banks is on circulation. There are a good many bankers here, and if I am in error on this point I am sure they will correct me.

I say again there would be a saving of $20,000,000 in gold annually, to be added to the $27,000,000 or more saved by the substitution of three sixty-fives, which, with increased and profitable employment for the greenback, would be a long stride toward a convertible currency. When we shall owe but $45,000,000 gold a year, and have this employment for our greenbacks, you will have the gold and greenback at par, and the resolution of 1869 will have been executed. This is my answer to the gentleman now when it comes legitimately within the scope of my argument.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My former question was merely preliminary. The question I wish the gentleman to answer is, whether he considers the faith of the Government pledged to the redemption of these greenbacks in coin? The gentleman says he thinks the thing will be done; but that does not answer the question.

Mr. KELLEY. I say I think the faith of the Government is pledged to the redemption of the greenback; but I have no time to go into a scientific discussion of the question of what is redemption. Some day I shall be glad to have the gentleman make an hour's speech and let me puzzle him with a few questions, such as whether a thing is not redeemed when it buys its full value.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman said he welcomed questions when they related to the point under consideration. He turned to me just now and said that he had reached my point. Therefore I have asked him, not what his bill will accomplish, but whether he regards the faith of the Government as pledged to the redemption of these greenbacks in coin, as soon as possible, according to the declaration of the act of 1869.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If there is such a pledge, of course we must go to work with the view of keeping that pledge. I do not say whether the gentleman's plan is the best or not. But I want to know whether he considers that there is such a pledge.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thought the form of the gentleman's first question was a little offensive.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly not.

Mr. KELLEY. I thought it was offensive when he asked me whether I thought the deliberate act of Congress pledged the Government. It was probing my moral sense, which I trust is as quick as that of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. His answer was, although he voted for that resolution he thought it was "buncombe" and repealable. Certainly it was not offensive to the gentleman to ask whether he considered that it was a binding pledge or not.

Mr. KELLEY. I mentioned those facts in the history of the resolution, and I do not think there is a gentleman upon the floor who doubts that I told the absolute truth.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then, is the faith of the Government pledged to redeem these greenback notes?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; and if the gentleman will allow me to discuss any other point, I will, before I get through, show him how it may be done, if I have failed to do so already.

Then, sir, two of the objects of the bill are to give steadiness to the volume of currency and to the business of the country, and to prevent fluctuation in prices consequent upon the transfer of immense sums of money from one market to another at recurring seasons of the year.

It further proposes to allow the banks to hold the convertible bonds as their reserve. Private bankers will have the right to do it; our banking laws do not reach them. State banks will have the right to use them; our laws do not reach them. The only banks we legislate for, except to tax them and to prohibit them from issuing currency, are the national banks; and the bill proposes to authorize them to hold the proposed bonds as a reserve. This is done for two purposes: to enable them to hold a reserve without absolute loss on the capital thus held, and to create a market for the bonds, and thus obtain funds with which to buy up gold-bearing bonds, or gold with which to call them home from foreign lands.

It contains one other provision, and that is suggested by the law which limited the volume of greenbacks to $400,000,000 and provided for the acceptance of temporary loans on call after thirty days. The first experiment was to make them payable after thirty days from date of deposit, on ten days' notice. The practice finally came to be payment on call, because the certificates were rarely presented voluntarily for redemption, and the loans came to be overdue. The whole amount was therefore regarded as payable on demand, or a call loan. The provision to which I refer is that which provides for the creation and maintenance of a redemption fund of $50,000,000 of greenbacks which are never to be emitted for the ordinary purposes of the Treasury or for general use, but are to be held for the redemption of three sixty-five bonds, if presented in unusual amounts. The use of this fund would be to prevent the possibility of speculators cornering the Treasury by drawing on it when they would know its resources to be limited. If such a fund were not provided, the worthy men who manipulate affairs in Wall street might, when they knew the Government had been investing closely in 6 per cents, rush in a few millions of three sixty-five bonds; but so long as there shall lie $50,000,000 in the Treasury to meet them, a combination powerful enough to promise success cannot be made.

These, sir, are all the features of the bill; and I proceed in further reply to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] for it involves as a question of good faith in making the effort to get back to the days when specie shall flow into and out of the Treasury of the United States through the ordinary channels of business.

Mr. STANARD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANARD. The bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as he has explained it, does not expressly contemplate that these three sixty-five bonds may be held by the banks as a reserve in the place of the 25 per cent. required under the law. The gentleman's explanation does not seem perfectly clear to me, although I am in the main in favor of his bill, how an advantage will accrue to the circulation of the country by allowing the bonks to hold these bonds as a reserve. It is, I believe, a current idea that, for every dollar of these three sixty-five bonds the banks hold as a reserve, a dollar of the same currency reserve may go into circulation. This question is raised in my mind, which I should like to have the gentleman explain, as to whether or not for every dollar of the three sixty-five bonds the banks may be able to purchase and carry as a reserve a currency dollar does not have to go into the Treasury and there be held for the purpose of taking up these three sixty-five bonds when they may be called for in case of a stringency in the money market?

Mr. KELLEY. I think I comprehend the gentleman's question; and I believe if he had followed me closely he would have noticed that I had answered it.

Mr. STANARD. I thought you had answered it when you stated that your bill provided that fifty millions additional should be issued. But it did not seem to me that that answer was clear, because these fifty millions must be held as a reserve for special emergencies.

Mr. KELLEY. Let me recapitulate. I have said that the bill provides that the issue of the forty-four millions shall be legalized. It provides, again, that the banks may hold these three sixty-fives as a reserve. That would throw into circulation, as the Secretary of the Treasury advises me, about sixty millions of greenbacks, which now lie dead, being held in reserve to secure the redemption (themselves being inconvertible into gold) of the bank-notes, which are also inconvertible. The necessity for a reserve, if it exists, would be obviated by the issue of greenbacks instead of national-bank notes. Then it would be simply the banker's reserve; the reserve retained by prudent bankers for the safety and convenience of current business. The sixty millions now held by them would thus be released and go into circulation. The three sixty-fives, being convertible instanter at any sub-treasury, would be the equivalent of greenbacks, as are the certificates for the forty million of greenbacks now on deposit in the Treasury bearing no interest.

Gentlemen have asked me who will invest in a three sixty-five bond, when money is worth 7 and 10 per cent.? There are those who have forty millions of greenbacks deposited in the Treasury to-day, without interest, and carry certificates of deposit for them. Sir, those certificates of deposit are recognized throughout our country as the equivalent of greenbacks, and it is to the interest of the owners of them to have the Government keep their currency safely for them and give them these certificates. Now I apprehend that if the Government could pay the holders of those certificates 3.65 per cent. interest, and buy in forty millions of gold bonds with them, the holders of the forty millions would be benefited; the tax-payers of the country would be benefited by being released from the gold interest on forty millions of bonds; and gold and greenbacks would be brought so much nearer together, by the increased use, utility, and profit of the greenback and the diminished demand for gold. Have I answered the gentleman's question?

Mr. BURCHARD. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is moved that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. How much additional time does the gentleman ask for?

Mr. KELLEY. The House has extended the time, I believe, unlimitedly; and I shall put in an application for sixty minutes, although I shall try to get through a little sooner if not interrupted too frequently.

Mr. Speaker, let me say here that I am not in favor of expanding the credit system, and that I charge the falsely-called contractionists—those who demand specie payments through contraction—as being the real inflationists. They it is who have inflated the dangerous system of credit which brought us into bankruptcy in 1837, in 1840, in 1857, and again in last September.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. With the gentleman's permission, there is a point I want to understand distinctly, and on which I desire to ask him a question, in order to get at his idea.

I understand that the gentleman assumes that at certain seasons of the year there is a plethora of money. Certain persons have a large amount of money on hand which they do not want to use, and they would be willing to exchange that money temporarily for these three sixty-five bonds. Now, the Government of the United States issue three sixty-five bonds and invest the sum, whatever it may be, in 6 per cent. gold-bearing bonds. When they have to pay this money back they sell the gold-bearing bonds and get currency.

Mr. KELLEY. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield the floor?

Mr. KELLEY. Only for a question. I sat down while the gentleman was putting his question, being a little fatigued, and having before me the possibility of another hour's work.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Does the gentleman expect the Government to have money on hand to redeem these three sixty-five bonds; or with what funds does he expect the three sixty-five bonds to be redeemed?

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman had studied the process of making loans he would see that the first element of such a demand as he speaks of, unless as the result of combination, is not within the sphere of legitimate consideration. Loans are taken, as I said before—and I meant to amplify it a little—from the current profits of the people. They are taken oftentimes as a temporary investment, and become a permanent one. A million of dollars paid to the Treasury of the United States each working day in the year for three sixty-five bonds would take a loan of over $300,000,000 in the year. We went through the war upon an average receipt of about two millions a day when it was at its very climax. So long as there is a certain amount paid into the Treasury daily for bonds, so long the loan expands; so long as the Government is called upon to meet exigencies its wants are supplied; but at the end of the year the Government finds an increased demand for current funds to pay interest on the large loan accumulated during the year.

Sir, the House on my motion, has called for information from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will distinctly show the gentleman that there is no danger of these bonds ever coming in in any considerable amount, unless presented by a speculative or gambling combination of men who may see a chance of profit by embarrassing the Treasury. Who that has a Government obligation bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, and which he can convert any instant into greenbacks, would care to convert it? Why would he want to convert a three sixty-five and get the same sort of security—no better security—both being the obligations of the Government, which earns no interest?

The Chicago fire was a test of how the people cherish and hold on to a temporary loan of the Government bearing only 3 per cent. interest. There were $60,000,000 of 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates out then that were overdue. How much do you suppose the Chicago fire—blazing, burning, devastating as it did for three whole days, and thrilling with consternation merchants, bankers, and insurance companies—sent in for redemption? The whole amount it caused to be presented for redemption was $1,500,000.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. This bill seems to be based upon the theory that there is $100,000,000 of currency needed for the business of the country already in the business centers of the country, and the gentleman proposes to issue three sixty-five bonds now, and when the time comes when that money shall have been used, I want to know how the Government is to get the money to pay them?

Mr. KELLEY. Suppose a western man to have sold $100,000 worth of grain to somebody in New York. Instead of sending that sum by express in currency, these bonds would be delivered in payment and the currency drawn from the nearest sub-treasury, or if the vendor did not want to use currency he could retain the bonds, and the Government never hear of the transaction.

While these bonds will never become a part of the currency of the country, it is true that they will furnish a medium of exchange by which large transactions may be settled. They are convertible into money in Chicago, Saint Louis, or any other city in which there is a sub-treasury; and thus eastern men will be enabled to meet the autumnal demand for the purchase of grain in the West by exchange, and the West will be enabled to meet the spring demand for manufactures by return of exchange, without disturbing local money markets. I hope I have made myself clear to the gentleman.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. But suppose the Government should have several hundred millions of these, and they should all be suddenly presented for redemption; how would it pay them?

Mr. KELLEY. If my excellent friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, had not by mistake carried off the copy of Fraser's Magazine for October last, I would answer the gentleman in the language of Professor Bonamy Price, of Oxford, when reviewing Mr. Bagehot's Lombard Street. But as I am without the magazine I can only say that he treated the question, what would be the consequence if all the notes of the Bank of England should be presented simultaneously, as out of the domain of reasonable discussion.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Excuse me a moment. I have no doubt the gentleman understands this question better than any other person does. I do not, however, consider that he has given any answer to my question.

Mr. KELLEY. Then, my dear sir, allow me to ask you a question. Will you give me any reason why people holding a Government security, convertible at will into greenbacks, and bearing interest, should rush it upon the Government in order to get non-interest-bearing greenbacks?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Yes, sir; I can give you a reason.

Mr. KELLEY. The thing is so clear in my own mind that probably I do not see the pertinency and force of your question.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I wish I could make you see it.

Mr. KELLEY. I am anxious to see it.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I will answer in this way: in the community where I live greenbacks are a necessity. The gentleman has illustrated that in the case where these three sixty-five bonds would be used in making the exchanges between the buyer in New York and the seller in my city, Chicago. But that does not cover the whole case. The $100,000,000 suggested by the gentleman here, or the sum, be it more or less, represented by these three sixty-five bonds, and which finds its way into the Treasury during a season when currency is not needed, would, in my opinion, be again required when the necessities of business demanded an increase of currency. In my opinion a condition of things is likely to arise when that entire sum, $100,000,000, more or less, will be again wanted in currency for circulation. Then how is the Government to take up the bonds?

Mr. BECK. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that gentlemen, speaking to each other, should address the Chair, so that we all can hear them. I am very much interested in what both these gentlemen are saying, but they converse with each other in so low a tone that we cannot hear what they are talking about.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] I desire to say that I cannot conceive it possible that an obligation which might represent exchange in settling large transactions, not taken on the faith of a banker, nor of a local community, but on the faith of the Government, with a pledged fund for its redemption, should be hurried in for redemption in any considerable amount. Then I remember the other fact—and that has been the practice whenever we have had outstanding temporary-loan certificates, which are in fact convertible bonds—that on each day the deposits exceeded the drafts until the total amount allowed by law to be issued was out, and then they ceased to come in. The answer of the Secretary of the Treasury has, unhappily, not come up from the printing office, and I cannot refer to it. But gentlemen will get it, I hope, by Monday or Tuesday; then they can analyze the figures for themselves. A passage from Gibbons's United States Debt, Finances, and Taxation, may illustrate the subject:

> It is in the organization of the great body of the debt, consisting of $2,500,000,000, after the normal currents of business began to revive, that we shall find the example to instruct us as to the true character and meaning of a public debt.
> The expenses of the Government reached about two millions for every secular day during four years. The loans, of course, amounted to the same, excepting the revenue from import duties, which, for the sake of simplicity, we leave out of present view. It is entirely to the daily transactions that our attention is now to be directed.
> That transaction consisted of two parts: first, of the payment into the national Treasury of $2,000,000; second, of the payment out of the Treasury, for expenditures, of precisely the same amount. On some days there might be more paid in and less paid out; but in the long run the amount of disbursements was equal to the receipts, and it simplifies the case to reduce it to the daily average.
> The result, then, is that one set of people paid the two million of currency into the Treasury, and it was immediately paid out on the same day to another set of people. And this is an advantage to both parties, for the presumption is that those who pay in have more currency than they want for any immediate purpose, and those to whom it is paid out have less than they want. It goes from the latter into the hands of laborers, tradesmen, and artisans. That is to say, that the organization of the loan of two million has not taken any money out of the use of the markets; it has not absorbed one penny of capital.
> We have only to repeat this transaction six times a week, and may do it with the same two millions of currency, to organize twelve millions of the debt; and, continued through the year, it would organize six hundred and twenty-four millions.
> Let us reduce the transaction to a still lower amount. If we divide the two millions into twenty parts, $100,000 of currency will be sufficient to organize the whole by repetition of service. We have only to suppose that each one of twenty subscribers has a demand of $100,000 against the Government, and is desirous to invest his money in the bonds as soon as he receives it. The arrangements for the sale of the bonds secure this exact result, for it is of no consequence who takes the bonds, nor whether the money employed consists of the same bank-bills in each round of service. The material facts are that the bonds are taken; that no more than $100,000 of currency is in use at any one time to effect the negotiation; and that when the negotiation is complete the currency is liberated, and mingles in the general mass of the circulation.
> This example shows with precision what office the currency performed in the organization of our public debt. It was that of the hammer which the carpenter uses to nail shingles on a roof. After the roof is finished, the hammer is still unimpaired for service in finishing other roofs. It is true the example supposes a more frequent repetition of service by the currency than was positively attained, or than would be practicable under ordinary circumstances. This does not, however, impair its force; and although the amount of currency displaced from commercial employments during the organization of our debt is known to have been as high as fifty millions, and perhaps to have exceeded that sum, such an absorption of it is to be attributed to a bad method of business, and not to any necessity of the case.
> The foregoing relation of itself explains the meaning of "borrowing money," "making a loan," and other like expressions applied to the financial transactions of the Government. It shows how little ground there is for the disturbance generally created in the money market by an announcement that the Secretary of the Treasury is coming upon "the street" to borrow "a large amount of money"—say $100,000,000. This means, commercially and practically, that the yearly taxes are to be increased by $6,000,000 if the rate of interest be 6 per cent., and $5,000,000, if the rate be 5 per cent. It does not mean that the whole market of commerce and labor is to be distrained upon to furnish that large amount of money, to be held in sequestration until liberated by the slow course of the ordinary disbursements.

Mr. BECK. As the gentleman has been interrupted so much, before he begins his regular line of remarks I would like to ask him a question, as everybody else seems to be doing. My question is this: what interest has either the Government or the holder of a national bank note in having any reserves at all held by the bank, when the bank deposits with the Government 6 per cent. gold-bearing bonds, worth $1,000, for every $900 of currency issued, and the United States guarantees that currency to the holder, whether the bank is solvent or insolvent? What interest has the holder of our currency or the Government of the United States in the question of reserves at all? And if the Government and the currency holder have no interest in it, why should we be legislating about deposits? I have never been able to understand that.

Mr. KELLEY. That question is not involved in my bill; but as the law now requires a reserve, the bill simply provides that so far as it is required these bonds may be used instead of greenbacks. I agree entirely with the gentleman that the holding of a reserve for the redemption of the notes is an absurdity; they are secured by the deposit of bonds. It is suggested to me by two gentlemen here who believe in the reserve system that they are held for the security of depositors in order that they may be sure of getting something in the nature of currency on presentation of their checks. I have always supposed that they were held in part to secure the redemption of their notes. If they are held as security for deposits, it is in my judgment an absurdity. The Government might as well make every umbrella-maker hold a reserve with which to redeem a bad umbrella that had been imposed upon a citizen. The deposit of money with a bank or a banker is a voluntary act on the part of the depositor, with which the Government has nothing to do. But the taking of a bank-note is not a voluntary act, and therefore the Government should not only protect the note-taker in the value of the note, but it should make the note itself. The making of money, whether that money be bullion or paper, is an attribute of sovereignty that never should be delegated by the Government.

Mr. BECK. One other question only.

Mr. KELLEY. I am very ready to answer questions as far as I can, but I should like to get on a little with my line of argument.

Mr. BECK. One other question, only, and I will not trouble you further. It is this: if the bill of the gentleman goes into effect, as I suppose he hopes it will, I want to ask him why the national-bank system should be kept up at all?

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman had listened to me he would have found that I have said that, although the question is not involved in my bill, I cannot see why we should not issue greenbacks for national-bank notes, and relieve ourselves from the payment of $20,000,000 in gold annually. I have already said that, but it was so long ago in the course of this speech that the gentleman has forgotten it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. I had supposed that the gentleman in providing a system would make it complete.

Mr. KELLEY. As I have already remarked, that seems to me to be a question for the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I have not introduced it into my bill, which relates to the legitimate business of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BECK. The reason I ask the question is this: When we have, say $400,000,000 of greenbacks and $350,000,000 of national-bank notes, all making one currency, the volume of the currency being what causes the difference between paper and gold, and when we guarantee those national-bank notes, I am unable to see why we should furnish the banks currency at 1 per cent. when nobody else enjoys the same advantage.

Mr. KELLEY. I have said that those who raise the cry of resumption and contraction are, in my view, the inflationists of the day. In proportion as you contract the currency in a country of resources, peopled by an enterprising people, you force private credit into expansion. You contract the currency and build a pyramid standing on its apex. The circulating medium—the money with which retail trade is carried on and wages paid and the expenses of travel borne—is withdrawn, and credit rises, ever broadening, until, with your inverted pyramid, your whole financial system topples over with a crash.

I propose to illustrate the truth of this proposition. In 1866 the banks of this country held one-fourth of the national debt. They could not find private obligations in which to invest their funds. The cash system prevailed. I read again from Gibbons on the United States Debt, Finances, and Taxation, a book which every member in this House should, in my judgment, have by him as a text-book.

On page 150 this able writer says:

It is well known that the rebellion struck down commercial and personal credit generally, inaugurating in its place cash settlements, for which the increasing currency was more convenient and satisfactory than had been the promissory note and the open book account. It is computed from the records of the New York clearing-house and from other sources of information that of the loans and discounts carried by the banks in October, 1866, ($623,786,993.) at least one-half consisted of Government securities, showing a decline in strictly commercial paper, as compared with 1861, of $334,884,924. The total of open book credits in 1861 exceeded that of 1866 by a much greater sum, so that we are sure of being within the truth when we name $800,000,000 as the volume of business, supported and carried on continuously in 1866 by the currency, which in 1861 was represented by promissory notes and current book credits.

Again on page 177, the same author says:

It is unjust and untrue to allege that the banks generally are expanded beyond prudence, while half their loans consist of Government securities. The inevitable consequence of the contraction of legal-tenders will be to put these securities on sale because they are the most easily convertible part of bank resources; and hence it is that their price, and the price of stocks generally, decline when contraction begins.

When a system of credit is no more extended than is needful to the wants of business, an effort to contract any part of it will either force a compensation from the other parts, or the whole will be distressed. The legal-tenders are as gold to the banks. No sooner are they touched than the whole system thrills as it was wont to do formerly when bill-holders began to run for specie. In short, the contraction of legal-tenders by the Government, while it seizes the gold of commerce and locks it up in the independent Treasury, is equivalent to a run for specie on the banks; and while the banks "hold one-fourth of the entire indebtedness of the United States," it is a run of the Government on its own creditors.

The theory on which currency is alleged to inflate prices requires a certain amount of currency for a certain amount of business. If that amount is not exceeded, any contraction of currency would abridge or distress labor. We have seen this result on several occasions recently when the Treasury has attempted the experiment of contraction. No sooner was it begun than "a cry of pain" was heard through the markets, and it had soon to be abandoned.

This was in 1867.

It is reasonable to infer that if there had been an excess of currency in issue, a part would have stagnated in the banks and no distress could have been caused by the withdrawal of that part. But the proof was immediately developed that there was no stagnation.

Now, sir, I invite the attention of gentlemen to a table which is most significant on this point. It is a table of the loans and discounts, the capital and surplus, the individual deposits and the legal-tender reserves of the national banks on the 1st of October in each year, from October, 1865, to September 12, 1873. In 1865 the loans and discounts were $487,000,000, and the legal-tender reserve was $189,000,000. In 1873, the $487,000,000 of loans and discounts had swollen to $944,000,000, and the reserve had shrunk from $189,000,000 to $113,000,000. Thus it is shown that as you contract the currency you enslave labor and enterprise, consolidate capital, and raise the rates of interest, building, as I said, an inverted pyramid, which, sooner or later, must topple, involving all in destruction. But let the figures tell their own story:

Year.	Loans and discounts.	Capital and surplus.	Individual deposits.	Legal-tender reserve.
1865	$487, 170, 136	$431, 970, 586	$549, 081, 254	$189, 988, 496
1866	603, 247, 503	468, 638, 246	597, 960, 993	205, 770, 641
1867	609, 675, 214	486, 769, 002	568, 212, 337	157, 439, 099
1868	657, 668, 847	498, 620, 272	603, 084, 550	156, 047, 205
1869	682, 883, 106	502, 554, 485	593, 029, 491	129, 564, 295

The statement for 1873 is that of September 12. The effect of the panic was to diminish in one month the loans by $62,000,000, the deposits by $83,000,000, and the legal-tender reserve by $2,000,000.

Again, I have another equally striking illustration from another source. According to the Financial Report of 1872, page 200, the Government on the 30th of June, 1865, had outstanding in currency $698,918,800; while on the 30th of June, 1872, the $698,000,000 had been reduced to $399,000,000; the circulation withdrawn, the banking credit swelling as I have shown you.

They who demand that the Government, while maintaining an inconvertible currency, shall furnish as much as needed by the current business of the day, are the real contractionists. They who find their profit in dealing in credit, your men of realized wealth, your men who own stock in a dozen national banks, those who are themselves bankers, want the currency contracted; for then the poor fly must come into their net and yield its blood to them.

The Finance Report for 1872 supplies ample proof of this allegation. At page 290, under the head of "currency outstanding at the close of each fiscal year for the last eleven years," we find the exhibits following:

June 30, 1865:
Old demand notes	$472, 603 50
Legal-tender notes, new issue	431, 066, 427 99
Compound-interest notes	191, 721, 470 00

Mr. Speaker, my strength will not permit me to go on and offer other suggestions that I would like to present. I have given you one historic parallel; and I propose to close by giving you what may be another. I turn to a book with which most of you are, I trust, somewhat acquainted. I propose to deduce a little historical instruction from the twelfth chapter of the First Book of Kings:

3. And Jeroboam and all the congregation of Israel came, and spake unto Rehoboam, saying,

4. Thy father made our yoke grievous: now therefore make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee.

5. And he said unto them, Depart yet for three days, then come again to me. And the people departed.

6 And King Rehoboam consulted with the old men that stood before Solomon his father while he yet lived, and said, How do ye advise that I may answer this people?

7. And they spake unto him, saying, If thou wilt be a servant unto this people this day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants forever.

8. But he forsook the counsel of the old men, which they had given him, and consulted with the young men that were grown up with him, and which stood before him:

9. And he said unto them, What counsel give ye that we may answer this people, who have spoken to me, saying, Make the yoke which thy father did put upon us lighter?

10. And the young men that were grown up with him spake unto him, saying, Thus shalt thou speak unto this people that spake unto thee, saying, Thy father made our yoke heavy, but make thou it lighter unto us; thus shalt thou say unto them, My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins.

11. And now whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke: my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.

The king took the counsel of the young men, who were probably fair representatives of the creditor class and bullion and credit mongers of to-day; and in doing so he sealed the fate of his Secretary of the Treasury; for when Adoram, "who was over the tribute," appeared among the people, we are told that "all Israel stoned him with stones, that he died."

Mr. Speaker, the crisis was evidently a financial one, for they took the officer who had power over the tribute and stoned him until he died. We live in more humane days. I have no apprehension if now, in the season of our people's calamity, we restore war taxes and proceed to further contract their currency and reduce their wages, they will stone with stones until he shall die our present amiable Secretary of the Treasury. Sir, they know the power there is in the ballot, and what they will probably do will be to cast ballots and not stones; so that if we go on, as we have been going for the last six years, scourging them first with whips and then with scorpions, the places that now know us politically will soon know us no more forever.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr Speaker, the importance of the subject which has just been presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the positions he has taken are my apology for making at this time, without preparation, a few suggestions to the House and to the gentleman himself in answer to what he has said.

In the first place, I wish to say, in regard to the bill to which he has called the attention of the House, that it is, in my judgment, one of excessive inflation, and can result in nothing else. The inquiry made by my colleague, [Mr. WARD,] which was not answered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, shows this convincingly to the House—or would have done so if the gentleman had answered it.

This bill proposes that holders of legal-tender notes may go to the Treasury, and demand in exchange for those notes bonds to the full extent of the issue here proposed to be authorized—$400,000,000. It then proposes that the Secretary of the Treasury shall put that $400,000,000 again into circulation. The gentleman confesses those three sixty-five bonds will be used as circulation. And he said further, in quoting from a distinguished writer on this subject, that the sky would fall as soon as any one would send those bonds to the Treasury and demand greenbacks for them. Hence what is the practical effect? It is to increase the present circulation by $400,000,000 at least of convertible bonds used as currency, and to put off, if we proceed in this policy, the day for the resumption of specie payments forever.

Is that what the gentleman means? That is the logic and scope of his argument.

His reference to the day when England suspended specie payments, extolling that as a glorious period in her history, means, if it means anything, that we should forever continue to follow that example. I do not believe it is the judgment of this House, or that it is the judgment of the country, that we should never return to specie payments. It may be against immediate contraction, it may be against substitution of other forms of Government indebtedness for legal-tenders at this time; but I do not believe the people intend specie payments shall never be resumed in this country. I say if the agricultural interests of this country, if the people of the West, understand their interests, they will hail the period when we can return to the safe system we used to have in the early days of the Republic.

The exchanges of this country with foreign nations amount to more than $1,200,000,000 annually, exclusive of the precious metals. Our imports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, were $663,710,597, of which about $21,000,000 consisted of the precious metals. Our exports were $649,132,563, of which about $98,000,000 were breadstuffs; $77,000,000 provisons; $225,000,000 cotton; $25,000,000 tobacco; and $74,000 coin and bullion. We exported last year, exclusive of the precious metals, $575,000,000. We imported, exclusive of coin and bullion, $642,000,000. Those values are measured abroad by the value of the world's currency, which is the value of the precious metals.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does he consider that the system we had before national banks were introduced, the system we had before the war, in Iowa and Indiana, was a safe system of currency?

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Indiana, I hope, is not criticising any particular phraseology I used. If he does, the suggestion he makes does not lie even to my phraseology. I said, "in the early days of the Republic."

Mr. COBURN. Did we have a currency of gold and silver even at that time?

Mr. BURCHARD. Not exclusively. We had a currency which, before the war, was without Government supervision, and in that respect what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] desires. He has just advocated the abandonment of the regulation of the banks and their reserves. He would return to that glorious period when there was no regulation of the currency, no requirement for the protection of deposits, no regulation of the banks. No, sir; I do not consider that a sure and safe system, nor one for us to return to. And I do not desire to return to that system of State banks, without any security for depositors or the people, as was the case at that time.

I believe it is a wise regulation in the general banking law that the banks should do, what every safe and prudent banker does, reserve a sufficient amount in ordinary times to meet the wants of his customers. And every safe bank in the country does this, the safest banks and the most conservative banks keeping more than the 15 per cent. or 25 per cent. required in their respective localities; and I do think it would be doing an unwise thing to repeal the provision which requires the banks to retain a reserve.

But I was diverted by the question of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN]—and I presume it was suggested in all kindness—from the particular proposition I was considering at the time, namely, the vast amount of exchanges that were required to be settled in that which is exchangeable throughout the world; those exchanges and those commodities settled abroad in that value having their prices regulated throughout all this country by that value. You may ignore specie payments, you may ignore coin in your laws, but the laws of trade and business, that are higher than any enactments of Congress, will establish those values if you have any commerce.

If you could put around this country a wall that would exclude any competition of commerce with foreign countries, then, perhaps, we might make stamped paper or any other substitute for money answer between our people. But so long as there are balances against us to be settled with other nations, as with Cuba, with Spain or France, coin being required to transmit to those countries to settle the balances in their favor; or when again there are exchanges in our favor (as is usually the case between us and Great Britain) which are settled by the shipment of coin to this country, we receiving coin in the latter case from the debtor country, we cannot dispense with the use of the precious metals.

Now, I said that our portion of the country, the western country especially, was deeply interested in this question; and I will tell you why. If legal-tenders were at a fixed appreciation or depreciation it would not be so material, only as two monetary standards require additional middle-men to make the exchanges of the country. If you could have it permanent, if you could have invariable legal-tenders, or your currency at just such an exchangeable value with foreign currencies and coin, it would not be so material; but when you have a varying currency, two evils result: first, you bring in a new class of men who speculate and live by taking advantage of the fluctuations in the monetary standard of value; second, it causes an injustice between debtors and creditors; because when a man contracts to pay three or six months from date such a sum of money, he may pay more or he may be required to pay less, according to the varying value of the legal paper taken or promise which the law authorizes to be used in satisfaction of the debt.

I have a statement here, taken from a commercial newspaper, showing the rise and fall, since 1865, in gold. It varies from 4 to 10 per cent. every year. Notice the frequent changes. In March, 1866, there was a fall between that and the previous October of 12 per cent. In April of that year there was a fall of 11 per cent. more. In September, 1871, there was a rise of 5 per cent.; in December a fall of 7 per cent.; in August, 1872, a rise of 7½ per cent.; in December a fall of 4 per cent.; in April, 1873, a rise of 7 per cent., and in September a fall of 5 per cent., the price of gold then being 114. In October, within a month, there was a fall of 4 per cent.; and now it has again risen about 3 per cent. The statement to which I have been referring is as follows:

1865—January	234¼
May	128½	Fall	106
October	149	Rise	20½
1866—March	136½	Fall	12½
April	125	Fall	11½
May	141½	Rise	16½
June	167⅝	Rise	26⅛
September	143¼	Fall	24⅜
December	131¼	Fall	12
1867—September	146⅜	Rise	15⅛
December	133	Fall	13⅜
1868—August	150	Rise	17
November	132½	Fall	17½
1869—May	144⅜	Rise	12⅝
December	119¼	Fall	24½
1870—January	123½	Rise	4
March	110½	Fall	13
July	122⅝	Rise	12½
November	110½	Fall	12½
1871—September	115⅝	Rise	5⅛
December	108⅜	Fall	7
1872—August	115⅝	Rise	7¼
December	111⅜	Fall	4½
1873—April	119¼	Rise	7⅛
September	114	Fall	5½
1874—January	111	Rise	3

Now, what does this variation in the value of our currency introduce? I say it has brought in a new class of middle-men who are handling the exchanges of the country. Before the war there were in New York only about one hundred members of the stock board. Since the war the number has increased, until at the present time these stock-brokers or members of the association, according to a statement I saw a short time ago, number about eleven hundred. If I recollect rightly, it was stated or testified at the time of the investigation of the causes of the gold panic in 1869, that for admission to that stock board, it was necessary to pay a one thousand dollar membership fee. There have been, then, $1,100,000 paid for admission to that stock board. What does that mean? Are they producers? No, sir; they are feeding upon the wealth of the community. They are gamblers dealing with our commodities, putting up and lowering the price of gold and thereby affecting the values of the cotton, the corn, the wheat, and the provisions generally of our country. Now, if we can dispense with these men, I say it would be to the advantage of the agriculturists of the country, more than any other class of men.

But we not only have that. We have these speculators, these cotton and corn gamblers, in every corner of the country. We have in Chicago and in Detroit men that are gambling and speculating upon the wealth and industry of the country; and that is engendered and produced by this system of irredeemable currency that we have in the country.

The system of an irredeemable currency necessitates in commercial cities gold-brokers who necessarily must be supported and who become enriched upon the products of the country there exchanged. The importer and the shipper at the sea-board dealing in commodities to be valued and paid for in coin, buy or contract of, or through, the gold-broker for coin to be delivered when the payment is to be made.

Now, I have another objection to the proposed plan; and I will say here that I came to this Congress with no convictions against any practical policy, if, indeed, any could be devised, by which to stop this gambling and excessive deposit at New York and other commercial centers. I would be prepared, I think, to support any feasible plan which will, without inflation and without increasing the interest burden upon the people, withdraw the excess and idle currency from circulation during the summer months and restore it when more circulation is needed to move the crops or do the business of the country.

Mr. STANARD. The gentleman has been speaking of the rise and decline in gold for a series of years, and he seems to have given great thought to the subject, and I wish to ask him a question, not for the purpose of invalidating his argument, but that I may obtain light. I desire to ask him whether in his opinion the advanced premium on gold as it now stands, and as it has stood for years past, is on account of a distrust on the part of the people of the country in our currency, or on account of an excessive demand for gold to meet our foreign balances?

Mr. BURCHARD. Well, I do not know that I can answer that question categorically. The only way in which it can be done would be by a comparison of our currency with that of other countries. France has to-day an irredeemable currency, but she, as a late writer in the newspapers on this subject observed, passed a law that in 1879, I think it is, she will resume specie payment. There is only a depreciation of from ¼ to ½ per cent. in her currency, although she has but three-fourths of the circulation that we have; but she has a large amount of coin, and the amount of coin and the certainty of resumption, I believe, give confidence to the minds of the people, so that exchange can be made, although it is not required to be done by law, at only a small discount.

Now, what is the particular influence on the minds of business men that induces them to give a premium on gold in exchange for notes of this kind is a matter of opinion. I do not know. I believe that as you inflate the currency and postpone the day of redemption, you thus reduce confidence in your notes in the minds of business men.

Another law of business, an inexorable law in trade, in the export to and exchange of commodities with foreign countries, is this: that which a country has no need of it exports. The West exports its grain because it cannot consume it itself, and the East exports its manufactures because it cannot consume them, as it produces more than are needed for its use.

Sir, when we passed a law making paper money a legal tender, its effect was to require the use of that money and to dispense with and drive abroad the coin in the country; and it will never return until you so change your laws that the people of this country will require more coin. As long as coin is a cheaper commodity here than abroad, it will go abroad as other commodities do. The laws of trade apply to gold coin, as all writers on the subject admit. When the law of 1862 was passed, there was actually in this country, or rather on the 1st of January 1863, $341,000,000 in coin.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. What was the amount of currency of other kinds?

Mr. BURCHARD. I can give the gentleman the figures for two or three years. In 1860 we had $207,000,000 of paper currency and $280,000,000 of coin; in 1861 we had $202,000,000 of paper currency and $248,000,000 of coin; in 1862 we had $218,000,000 of paper currency and $310,000,000 of coin; in 1863 we had $539,000,000 in paper currency and $341,000,000 in coin; and so on, until in 1865 we had $888,000,000 of paper currency in circulation; and in 1866 we had $964,000,000 of legal-tender paper in circulation and only $248,000,000 in coin in the country, hoarded by the people or in the banks and Treasury, but wholly withdrawn from circulation.

In 1862 we passed the act, and I do not think my colleague questions the principle I state in regard to the fact that the putting into circulation of such paper drives out the circulation of coin. He knows that in Illinois, in the "stump-tail" time, the class of notes put into circulation drove out the notes of other more solvent banks. Men and bankers sorted their currency, and for a time not a sound bank-note or even exchange on eastern cities could be obtained without payment of an exorbitant premium.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman one other question. Do you think there is currency enough in the country at the present time, or is it your object to go back to specie payment?

Mr. BURCHARD. I have not advocated to-day an immediate return to specie payments. I have been opposing the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a certain kind of bonds in exchange for legal-tender notes. I do not know that I need to answer my colleague's question, because my opinion on that subject is not material to the discussion of the criticism I make upon the bill and its avowed object and effect. But I will say in that connection that money is needed for circulation—that is, to facilitate exchanges between people in their business transactions. In addition, there is another use of money, and that is as the representative of capital, or circulation in reserve. That is the meaning of your deposits—of the actual money in bank. As has been said here, money is sometimes wanted in Chicago with which to buy wheat. Sometimes during the summer months, when business is idle, money is not wanted for circulation. It is then practically withdrawn from circulation; it does not facilitate exchanges—the true office of money; it lies idle in the Treasury, or in banks, or in some place where it is withdrawn from active circulation.

Now, at times there is more money wanted in one place than in another. In Chicago they may want capital all the time, but not all the time money to facilitate exchanges. They may have a scarcity of capital to satisfy calls for time loans, and yet sufficient currency to make all the exchanges for the business of the city. When the pork-packer goes to the bank and asks for an accommodation, what does he want? He does not want the money; he wants the hogs; or, if he wants money, it is to make an immediate exchange of it for hogs to sell them again. If he wants to make immediate payment, he can get a million of dollars with which to buy hogs for immediate sale. But what he wants is capital. He wants a million dollars' worth of hogs to salt and keep for three months, until he can send them forward to market. He then wants capital, another use for money, or one use which money will answer or subserve.

But I did not intend to enter upon that discussion. I only suggest to my colleague [Mr. WARD] that there is frequently in the public mind, and among men who are theorists upon this subject, a confounding of the two uses of money. This man says, "I want money," when he wants capital, and not money to facilitate exchanges.

Mr. COBURN. Let me ask the gentleman whether if we had had some reserve somewhere in the United States, where money could have been got last fall by capitalists who had large amounts of property, would it not have been of great benefit to the country? Was not the need currency, instead of capital; and was it not the lack of currency and not of capital that brought the panic upon us?

Mr. BURCHARD. I am glad the gentleman has referred to that question—what was the cause of the panic. I perceive that I am not pursuing any line of argument, but I would like to talk about the panic.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. And in connection with that subject of the panic, allow me to make a statement, and the gentleman can discuss the two together, if he is willing.

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not like to mix things too much.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. The gentleman speaks of the distinction between capital and currency. During the panic which the gentleman is now to discuss, I saw with my own eyes men who were worth more than $1,000,000, who had in their vaults or in their safes the most undoubted securities, securities of the highest possible order, and upon which for weeks and weeks (I will not say months, for I desire to be within bounds) they were unable, at any rate of interest which any man could possibly afford to pay, (and I doubt if at any rate of interest at all,) to realize any money from any source or quarter with which to transact the business they were engaged in. Was that a result of the lack of currency or the lack of capital?

Mr. BURCHARD. In reply to that, I will state what I have heard, though I have not examined the statement to verify whether it is true or not. It is that at no time during the panic were Government bonds (the securities to which the gentleman refers, I suppose) below legal-tenders in value. They were depressed; they were, perhaps, at lower rates in the market, 3 or 4 per cent. below what they had been before. But men holding those Government bonds could have put those securities upon the market and have obtained in legal-tenders not only their face equivalent but a premium of 6 or 8 per cent. Now, if that was so, it shows that currency could have been obtained. I do not know how it may have been in Chicago or in Saint Louis, with gentlemen who were there engaged in business; but I am told by gentlemen who profess to have examined the market rates in New York that that was the case in that city.

Now, there are better remedies, in my judgment, though I do not care to suggest them at this time. I think it would be a better one than this to follow the one, or one based upon the same principle, suggested by the President in his last annual message. For instance, the holders of Government securities might have the right to go to the Treasury and deposit their bonds there, and upon them as a deposit receive a certain amount of legal-tender notes, say the face value of the bonds, the interest on the bonds to cease while thus deposited, and the bonds to be surrendered to the owner upon the return by him of legal-tenders to the amount loaned and issued upon the bonds.

Mr. STANARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURCHARD. I have one pending now, but I will yield.

Mr. STANARD. I would ask if the gentleman does not know that for the space of from three to four weeks, or perhaps six weeks, greenbacks could not be realized either in New York, or Boston, or Chicago, or Saint Louis, or any of the chief money centers of the country, upon bonds or even upon gold coin at any premium, but only at a sacrifice? I know that there were applications made in the chief money centers of the country for currency on gold, and the banks said to the persons so applying, "We will not give you greenbacks for gold except at par, because we may be called upon the next moment to pay this gold out over our counters." And there was a time when in actual transactions gold and bonds and greenbacks were all of the same value.

Mr. BURCHARD. I cannot yield any further. The gentleman asks as to my knowledge, and he has stated his own. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANARD. I was afraid the gentleman would not answer my question. The people in his section might not have been in the same pinch we were. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I stated in answer to my colleague the same proposition made by the gentleman. I presume there may be a state of the market such as the gentleman describes. It can be verified or disputed by gentlemen who will take the pains to look at the reports of the stock exchange in New York and other commercial centers during the time spoken of. But that is not pertinent as a reply to the question put to me in regard to the panic.

I think that the recent panic, like all other panics, was the result, among other causes, of inflation. An inflation of prices is sure, at some time, to work off the disturbance. The effect of an inflation in one country does not cease until it has affected other countries. A panic, like everything else, has its relations to surrounding circumstances. Our inflation of prices produced the very condition of the market which the gentleman talks about, making this the best market to sell in, and the poorest market to sell from. As a cause of this the balance of trade was against us. That cause continued, inducing high prices and keeping them up, until the prices abroad began to equalize themselves to the prices within this country, as they did within the last two years. A fall in prices ended speculation, made men anxious to sell and realize the present value; buyers became few, sellers numerous; men having obligations to meet, not being able to sell, became importunate borrowers. Such are some of the incidents and causes preceding and accompanying a panic.

The inflation of prices here, resulting from paper inflation, began to produce its effect abroad, just as gold inflation in 1857, resulting from throwing upon our country an immense amount of gold from the mines of California and other Western States, produced its effect abroad, and prices began to equalize themselves. It produced here speculation and fictitious prices. But during the last two years there has been an inflation abroad. Prices have gone up there 25 per cent. It is said the price of labor has advanced there, making this a poorer market to sell in and a better market to sell from. Ultimately there comes a fall in prices here and a fall to some extent in prices abroad, and as a consequence, in the adjustment of prices, there comes a more stringent loan market. Money is called stringent, and as some well-known commercial house fails to meet its obligations, public confidence is lost and a wild panic is the frequent result.

There is another cause for these panics. In all panics you find a large increase of loans in comparison with deposits. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] referred to the large amount of loans during the last year; there had grown to a volume of $900,000,000 and over of loans. When the proportion of loans and discounts to deposits or to circulation is very large, it frequently if not necessarily results, when any untoward cause affects public confidence, in a general panic.

Panics culminate at a time when loans and discounts are very largely expanded in comparison with the amount of deposits. In 1837, with a coin and paper circulation amounting to $222,000,000, the deposits were $127,000,000 and the loans and discounts $525,000,000—a proportion of more than four to one. The country had a disastrous panic. Then they became contracted, so that in 1843 we had but $142,000,000 of circulation, $56,000,000 of deposits, and $255,000,000 of loans. In 1857 the bank loans and discounts had risen to $684,000,000, with $230,000,000 deposits and $530,000,000 of circulation. Again, another panic. Before the war, in 1860, we had $254,000,000 of deposits and $602,000,000 of loans. I cite these facts from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1862-'63.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose any plan of my own. At this time my object was to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the House to this inevitable result of his plan of issuing bonds. The people would take the bonds and keep them in circulation, the Treasury at the same time having the right to use the legal-tender notes in payment of their indebtedness. Thus these bonds, instead of being taken to the Treasury for redemption, would be used by the people as circulation; and the effect would be to add $400,000,000 to the circulation.

Mr. STANARD. O, no.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. BURCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to suggest to the gentleman, (and I do it with deference to his judgment,) that it would be a very difficult thing to buy a pair of chickens in the market with a fifty-dollar convertible bond, or to pay your passage upon a railroad, or buy a pair of gloves with a fifty-dollar or a hundred-dollar or a thousand-dollar convertible bond; and that as these bonds would not be legal tender, shop-keepers, conductors, persons in the market, and laboring people might refuse to receive them. It is impossible that they should go into the currency. That they would furnish exchange which is now the privilege of the credit mongers, personal or corporate, of the country, is true; and that they would relieve the business community of the dull razors with which they are now shaved, by which the blood is drawn when it is only proposed to take off the beard, is also true.

I wish to correct the gentleman as to a misapprehension he has fallen into when he supposes I limit the amount of bonds to $400,000,000. I am nearly sixty years of age, and somewhat broken in health, but I hope to live to see the day when no foreigner will hold a bond of the United States, and when our whole debt will be floated at 3.65 and be in the hands of the American people.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman rose to ask me a question, and I should like to have him interpret the question he has put to me. [Laughter.] The gentleman does not propose, he says, to limit the amount to $400,000,000 of legal-tender notes.

Mr. KELLEY. The amount of legal-tenders—not convertible bonds.

Mr. BURCHARD. So much the more is that greater inflation. They would not be used for market purposes, no more than large bills are now used; but wherever a large bill, a $100 bill or larger sums, could be used these would be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I proceed with what I wish to say. We made a pledge when we issued the five-twenty bonds and authorized the issue of legal-tender notes that the issue of legal-tender notes should not exceed $400,000,000. We made that in the act of June, 1864. We made that pledge again, reiterating it in the act of February, 1865, that it should not exceed that amount; and upon the faith of that pledge we have kept up, at the present value in the market, the value of our legal-tender circulation, as compared with coin and the value of our bonds. I do not think we ought, directly or indirectly, when it will injure rather than benefit the interests of the country, to violate the pledge we made at that time.

In this connection I will say, finally, that I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury has any authority or right, or ever had any right, to issue any portion of that $40,000,000 which had been retired. I know it is claimed that under the authority which permitted him to redeem and cancel any portion of these notes and to issue others in their place he had that right; but under the act of 1857, which limited the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, there is this phrase used that nowhere else occurs in that law to my knowledge, or the law prior to that time, namely, "there should not be retired or canceled." Previously to that time he had the right to redeem and issue in lieu of them, but that act specifically used this phraseology: "There should be only $10,000,000 within six months retired and canceled; and after that only $4,000,000 retired and canceled." I think the framers of that law used that language advisedly when just preceding it in the same law, they said:

> Authorizing certain certificates of indebtedness or certificates of deposit or other representatives of value which have been or which may be issued under any act of Congress, the proceeds thereof to be used only for retiring Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress.

It seems to me he might just as well claim, after he redeemed or retired the bonds of the United States, after he had paid and canceled them, he might issue these bonds again. I know the Department claim they have the right, but as one who has partially, although not fully, examined the question, I give my opinion that the amount now authorized and legally in circulation is only $356,000,000 legal-tender notes.

But I have been again diverted, Mr. Speaker, from the proposition before the House, and which the gentleman from Pennsylvania advocated, namely, "Shall we authorize this particular measure—this issue of three sixty-five bonds?" I have shown the gentleman what will be some of the effects. Now, let me suggest another effect of the measure. Bonds sell for what they are worth. You cannot by law prescribe their value. Investments, like everything else, are worth what they earn; and the banker and the business man in New York, or anywhere in any commercial center, when he buys a bond examines it first as to its safety and the certainty of his getting the return of his money, and then what will it earn. Now, if a 5 per cent. bond at this time, measured in coin, earns 5 per cent. interest per annum, gold being 111, a $100 bond would earn $5.55 in currency. And that is now at about par in coin; currency, measured in the value of gold or coin, being about 10 per cent. depreciation. Now, throw three sixty-five bonds on the market, and according to the estimate I have just made a $1,000 currency bond, at 3.65 per cent., would yield $36.50 measured in currency; and a $1,000 gold 5 per cent. bond $55.60. That is, $650 of a 5 per cent. bond would earn as much as $1,000 of a currency bond; and it would require $1,550 of a currency bond to earn as much as a $1,000 gold bond. A currency bond at 3.65 would be worth 65 per cent. in gold, or 65 per cent. of what a gold bond would be; while a gold bond would be worth in currency 155. And that, it seems to me, would be the inevitable effect of issuing four hundred millions, or any number of millions, as is proposed, of these currency bonds, measured in the value of gold at the present time.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says they would be an exact equivalent for legal-tender notes. If so, coin would appreciate to 155, and legal-tenders depreciate to 65; and I believe that would be one of the results, that would be the effect in Wall street upon the currency, of issuing those bonds.

Now, in regard to this "buncombe" resolution of 1869, so called. I am sorry that the gentleman characterizes the solemn legislation of Congress, given to the world at that time, in that manner. It was not so understood by the country. I recollect well in 1867, when I had no interest other than the business interests of the country; when I was, if any one can claim to be so, one of the producing classes of the country; when we were watching the legislation of Congress, and when a gentleman who had been here in the winter of 1867-'68 about these lobbies, and had been conversing with members of Congress, came West to our country, and came West with these ideas of inflation, insisting it would be the popular cry to pay the bonds of the country, the gold-bearing bonds, so called, in legal-tender notes—I remember when he came home, he then being an officer in one of our banking institutions, the bank actually passed a resolution that they would sell their five-twenty bonds, and invest in ten-forty gold-bearing bonds to meet what they believed would be the legislation of Congress on that subject.

Gentlemen here are timid. They are afraid of the honesty, and integrity, and, it seems to me, the good sense of the people. I told that gentleman, "You converse with any of the five or ten leading men you can select from any town in this country or this region of country, and they will tell you they are opposed to that, and that they do not believe in it." "Well," he said, "you advocate that on the stump and before the people, and the crowd would be with you." "Yes," I said, "perhaps the men who have no great interest in the subject, no taxes to pay, and who feel no pride in maintaining the honor and credit of the Government, and are the loudest-mouthed upon that subject, might applaud." Well, I will tell you what proved the correctness of my views of the intelligence and sentiments of the people. At one of the first conventions which followed in one of our agricultural towns, where many among the farmers now, I suppose, are grangers, active, thinking, intelligent men—at one of their first town conventions they passed a resolution on that subject, advocating substantially this act passed by Congress, declaring that the faith of the nation was pledged to pay those bonds. And at the next county convention held in that county—the republican convention—they passed a similar resolution. And at the Illinois State republican convention, held at Peoria, they also passed a similar resolution. And the member of the committee on resolutions in the republican convention in 1868, in Chicago, from our State, insisted in committee upon that resolution, and was one of the foremost advocates of it, leading the men from the East, some of whom were a little timorous and afraid. And the people sustained the republican party on that, and Congress passed that act there in furtherance of, and in accordance with, the views of the people, and in accordance with the views of the republican party. And I believe it strengthened that party.

And I am happy to say that some leading opposition papers, the Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Times, having perhaps the largest circulation of any papers in the Northwest, are opposed, and have been opposed for years, to this system of inflation, but agree with what I believe will be the sentiment of Congress when they have fully examined this question—at least to put no impediments in the way of an ultimate and safe resumption of specie payments; certainly not to encourage inflation, which at this time would be disastrous to the business interests of the country, and more especially to the agriculturists of the Northwest.

Gentlemen may talk about who will come back to this Hall. It is not important who represents the people; but it is important that they should be represented aright, not perhaps by men who will blindly yield, as was said by the gentleman from Georgia, to the whim of the hour, but who correctly understand what is their interest and will advocate and support their interest here. That I believe is the duty of a Representative; and, as such, I cannot give at this time my voice or my vote in favor of the proposition that is embodied in the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] It has been stated—what I have not questioned, what I have no doubt is true; it is enough that I have had it from the mouths of men who have declared it to be true—that at times you could not obtain on Government securities as collateral legal-tenders or any other medium. And there may be a remedy, there have been remedies suggested; but I did not take the floor to propose any plan here. I did it only to suggest, as I have said, that there are objections in my mind to this plan which the able argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and I listen to no man with more pleasure than I do to that gentleman—has not convinced me would be for the interests of the people.

THE CAUSES OF THE LATE PANIC—THE DANGERS OF INFLATION AND THE REMEDY FOR OUR FINANCIAL TROUBLES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, the people of the nation are suffering under adverse circumstances very similar to those that followed the various suspensions of specie payments during the old system of banking which existed previous to the rebellion.

Many of the wheels of industry have ceased to run; great enterprises have been stopped; agriculture, manufactures, and commerce seem to have refused to make their usual profitable returns, and the labor of the nation appears to be paralyzed.

The suspension of Jay Cooke & Co., which was, to unreflecting minds, the cause of this great interruption of our national prosperity, was in reality but an effect of greater causes, operating, not only on them, but on the residue of the nation at large.

True it is that the stoppage of that firm was the occasion of other institutions failing to pay their liabilities; and as one great banking company has always minor ones connected with it, a suspension of payments by the former too often carries down the latter. These repeated suspensions awaken a distrust in the public mind, and the timidity of depositors and note-holders of banks and bankers causes them to make a run on institutions which are their debtors. They in turn, to sustain themselves, must call on those who owe them, and the demand for immediate payment by the creditors on their debtors, added to the want of confidence, creates a panic and a state of affairs that can only be checked by a suspension of payments, which causes everywhere financial confusion and distress.

The banks of the great cities, when they recently refused to pay checks in currency, and only by certification receivable on deposit and through the clearing-houses, suspended payment as much as did the banks under the old system when they refused to pay specie. They were not bankrupt; but as no bank can at any time pay all its demand debts, such as circulation and deposits, if suddenly called upon, it became necessary for the banks to refuse currency payments until they had time to collect their assets, or until confidence should be restored.

This measure of safety, however, has so far disturbed the business arrangements of the great interests of the country that railroad enterprises have been stopped, manufactories have been closed, agriculture has stagnated, thousands of men have been thrown out of employment, and poverty and despair have stalked sullenly through the land.

From a state of apparent prosperity we are suddenly struck down, and are now suffering all the ills of a severe adversity.

Political economists are speculating as to the cause of these disasters, and suggesting what they consider appropriate remedies, and the people generally are looking toward Congress for relief.

Unfortunately, however, the old sentiment, that "in the multitude of counselors there is safety," does not seem to be applicable now, for the multitude of able writers who tender their advice to Congress entertain views so divergent and antagonistic that it is impossible to adopt them all, and difficult to determine which is the best.

The wisest way, in my judgment, to attempt to cure any great financial disturbance, is first to seek its cause, just as the best method of healing a disease of the human system is first to ascertain its origin.

It seems to me that the whole suffering we at present experience is the result of what is familiarly known as "overtrading." The American mind is exceedingly expansive, progressive, and speculative. With a whole continent open to improvement and development; with vast mines of the precious metals, and all other kinds of minerals, ready to repay labor for its exercise; with illimitable virgin prairies awaiting the plow of the farmer; with boundless forests ready to furnish untold quantities of lumber; with every avenue to industry open to all, and with political institutions insuring equality of political rights and encouraging the industry of the people, we can scarcely avoid exercising our energies to the utmost, and running into excesses that produce financial revulsions.

We have overtraded in almost every direction. Our railroad system is, perhaps, the most notable example. In 1860 we had 30,635 miles of railroad completed; in 1870 we had 52,898 miles; and at the present time it is said that we have 67,000 miles finished at a cost of over $3,200,000,000; the extent of railroad having more than doubled in the last ten years, and being a greater length of railroads than is owned by all the rest of the world together.

We have run railroads out on the prairies far beyond the bounds of civilization and settlement, hoping that settlement and cultivation would follow along so rapidly that the traffic they made would afford at least sufficient funds to pay expenses and interest on their bonds. We have built them up through mountain cañons and defiles, to mining establishments, with the expectation that the profits from the precious metals would make such roads self-sustaining. We have extended them everywhere that the speculative fancy of their promoters induced them to believe that they would prove beneficial to the stockholders or to the speculators in town sites through which they were to pass.

This expansion of railroad operations was far too rapid to be a healthy one. That the development was impolitic, and that the hopes of the projectors were far too sanguine, is shown by the last volume of Poor's Railroad Manual, the best authority on the subject. It is there said:

> The leading railroad companies of the West are largely responsible for the excess of mileage that has been constructed. The Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway has increased from eight hundred and thirty miles in 1868 to thirteen hundred and ninety-six in 1872. Its stock and bonds have, in the same time, increased from $30,578,618 to $56,290,644, while the earnings have only increased from $6,577,645 to $6,957,771. Nearly the whole increase of mileage has proved unproductive. The Chicago and Northwestern Railway has also enormously increased its mileage in the construction of branch lines, so that the gross revenue on its investments is considerably below the average for the Western States. It is increasing its bonded debt to $48,000,000, to complete the various enterprises which it has undertaken. Its share capital at the close of the fiscal year for 1872 amounted to $35,878,644. To these two sums is to be added the capital of its leased lines, making an aggregate of nearly $100,000,000, with earnings at the rate of the last fiscal year of only about 11 per cent. While these vast additions to mileage and cost have been going on the earnings of the road have declined from $12,614,846 in 1868 to $11,402,161 in 1872.
> The stockholders of these roads should put a stop to a policy so suicidal—a policy which is working more mischief to the railroad interests of the country than all other causes combined, and which, unfortunately, has been indulged in, though in a less degree, by other roads than those named.

For a part of these wild operations in the Western and Northwestern States and Territories, Congress is responsible by making to railroads extensive grants of public lands through which they pass in quantities of alternate sections to the distance even of forty miles on each side of said railroads, equal in extent to European principalities.

These grants were obtained through the influence of members honestly interested in the development of their sections of the country, and by the urgent solicitations of importunate lobbyists, whose pertinacity arose from a less creditable motive.

The whole amount of public lands already certified to these railroads is 30,000,000 acres, and the whole amount which will be certified when the roads are completed will not fall short of 200,000,000 acres.

The vast expenditure of money already made in the construction of these western roads is, as already shown, largely unremunerative. It is to a certain extent dead or unproductive capital, withdrawn from the usual channels of active trade and commerce where most needed, and consequently depriving them of that much of the aliment by which they are sustained. Few, indeed, of these roads there be that pay dividends to their shareholders. On the 1st of January last, one hundred and fifteen railroads, representing one hundred and seventy-six millions of capital, with twenty-seven millions of interest due and payable that day in New York, defaulted in their payment. This does not include a large number of defaulting railroads whose interest was payable elsewhere.

This artificial and unnatural stimulus to the railroad system was the proximate cause of the establishment of great numbers of iron works, from the furnace to the rolling-mill, and the building up of various locomotive works, machine and car shops, and other mechanical industries that contributed to their operations, whilst dependent upon them for support.

These immense undertakings stimulated emigration from abroad, and the good wages paid out by the railroads and all establishments connected with them, enabled laborers and their families to consume more of the necessaries and comforts of life, and thus urged to unusual activity the manufacturers of dry-goods, agricultural implements, and the culture of the great staples, wheat, corn, and cotton.

Thus the workings of the extending railroad system alone, although others were not idle, directly and indirectly induced a factitious prosperity, and urged into an excessive vitality a great variety of industries that absorbed a larger amount of capital than the ordinary business of the country required.

In addition to the fixed capital necessary for these gigantic undertakings, a large amount of bank discounts was demanded by brokers and speculators in these railroad stocks and bonds which were made their footballs, and tossed to and fro in the market by the bulls and bears of the New York stock exchange until the clearings of the New York clearing-house amounted to over $100,000,000 per day.

In confirmation of my statement, let me say that the Comptroller of the Currency in his last most able and exhaustive report makes the statement that—

> The immediate cause of the crisis is, however, more apparent. The money market had become overloaded with debts. The cost of railroad construction for five years past had been $1,700,000,000 or $340,000,000 annually; while debt based upon almost every species of property, State, city, town, manufacturing corporations, and mining companies, had been sold in the market.
> The present financial crisis may, in a great degree, be attributed to the intimate relations of the banks of the city of New York with the transactions of the stock board, more than one-fourth, and in many instances nearly one-third, of the bills receivable of the banks since the late civil war having consisted of demand loans to brokers and members of the stock board, which transactions have a tendency to impede and unsettle, instead of facilitating the legitimate business interests of the whole country.

To this I may add that it took sixty-six years for the bank discounts of the nation to reach five hundred millions, which was the amount loaned out to individuals by the national banks on January 1, 1866. In less than eight years, say on September 12, 1873, their discount line had reached nine hundred and forty millions, being an increase of 88 per cent. in that short space of time. The circulation and deposits rose in the same time from eight hundred and ten to nine hundred and eighty millions, while the reserve of legal-tenders and specie and certificates of deposit fell from two hundred and six millions, or 25 per cent., to one hundred and thirty-one millions, or 13¼ per cent. of the immediate liabilities, being far below the average requirements of the law.

The legitimate business wants of the country did not warrant such a rapid inflation of bank credits with such a fearful decrease of that safety fund, the bank reserves. It was largely produced by the pernicious system of the payment by the banks of New York City of interest on deposits. After the suspension of 1857 the wiser managers of the New York banks saw that the practice had tended much toward that catastrophe, and in 1858 a committee of bank officers made a strong and able report condemning the practice and urging its discontinuance. Their counsels, however, did not prevail, and the practice was persisted in. Since the late panic the attention of a committee of the clearing-house of New York has again been called to it, and it is again denounced; and the evil effects it has had by inflating the credit system of the country, and weakening the reserves and leading to panics, is very ably set forth in the report of that committee. It is therein said that—

> Deposits which are derived from strictly commercial operations cannot fluctuate so widely from time to time as to produce disturbance in the community; and banks which confine their business to them, as they naturally arise, are always reliable and regular in their treatment of their dealers, and can be conducted with ease and comfort to their managers and safety to the public. On the contrary, deposits which are purchased by payment of interest, or otherwise, and which must, therefore, of necessity be largely loaned on demand, are the cause of continual agitation and solicitude to those who hold them in charge. They are certain to be withdrawn at the season of the year and at the moment most inconvenient to the banks and their dealers.

> And were it not for the fact that several of the 48 banks are more or less involved in the same practice, this disparity would be still more apparent.
> When the late panic commenced, the 60 banks composing the New York clearing-house were indebted for about $200,000,000 of deposits. Of this amount 3 institutions (paying interest to the country depositors) owed about $50,000,000, and, including these, 12 banks of similar character owed about $100,000,000; that is to say, 12 institutions held one half of the aggregate deposits, and the other 48, their associates, the other half.
> The proportionate reserve of legal-tender notes in the associated banks was also greatly in favor of the latter number, for the obvious reason that the banks which pay interest upon money can least bear to have any amount of it idle. The active demand first came, as it usually comes, for that portion of deposits due to country banks, who, in addition to their annual necessities, had been disturbed by failures of several city bankers holding large balances of money due to the interior.
> These deposits were to a great extent loaned upon stocks and bonds in Wall street, payable upon call, with the confident belief that they were there earning more than the interest paid for securing them, and were available as promised. But, from the very nature of the case, the rapid withdrawal of deposits from the banks made the call from every direction simultaneous, and closed every resource upon which the "street" derived its power to respond.

The Comptroller of the Currency, in his late report, also condemns the practice as demoralizing to the business of banking. In addition, however, to the mischief of paying interest on deposits, the banks added another in direct violation of law. The act of March 3, 1869, makes it a grave offense against a bank to permit any of its officers to certify a check on such bank unless there be funds to the credit of the drawer of the check sufficient to meet it, yet it was the daily custom of many of the banks to do it. That report says:

> So extensively has this practice been pursued by several institutions that the amount of such checks, which have passed daily through the clearing-house, has reached in some instances to twice and three times, and in one or two instances, to four and five times, their capital stock, and this through long periods of time.

From all this it will be seen that our present difficulties are the result of an inordinate and uncalled-for expansion of the railroad system; a vicious custom of banks paying interest on deposits, thereby imposing on them the necessity of lending those deposits to brokers and speculators "on call;" certification of checks when no funds were on deposit, thus affording an improper credit to the drawer without any substantial foundation; and a resulting deficiency in the reserves so great that the slightest panic drove the banks into suspension for want of ready money to meet a run upon them.

This was inflation, speculation, an expansion of the credit system to an unnatural extent, in short, a financial bubble; and when the credit of great corporations and banking-houses had been stretched to its utmost tension, and when the touch-stone of demand of payment came to be applied, by the withdrawal of country bank balances and merchants' deposits, the bubble collapsed and the distress we now experience ensued.

This abnormal condition of things has thrown the currency of the country into unusual channels, and as capital is always timid, it has driven it into holes and corners, there to lie until confidence is restored. Currency is scarce in some quarters; yet there is just as much of it in the country to-day as there was five months ago, and much more, in proportion to the business that is now done, than there was then. The difference is that those who hold it fear to let it go lest they may want it and cannot get it. Such was the fear of the banks when they suspended payment of currency, and such is the fear of the people since they found that they could not draw it from the banks on their deposits at pleasure.

To show that the people have abundance of currency, if they choose to use it, I need only state that the Comptroller of the Currency, in the same report, shows that up to November 1 last there had been issued of national-bank notes, legal-tenders, and fractional currency, seven hundred and fifty-nine millions; that the Treasury and banks held only one hundred and twenty-eight millions, leaving six hundred and thirty-one millions in the hands of the people. Since then this sum has been increased by drawing on the forty-four million reserve, and the whole sum in the hands of the people, including fractional currency, is not less than seven hundred millions.

The present unfortunate state of things has brought under consideration many devices to prevent the recurrence of a similar catastrophe.

The favorite scheme at present seems to be to create what is called "an elastic currency" that will regulate itself; that can be issued when the wants of the people require it, and will be withdrawn when the exigency of the occasion has passed away.

The system, as I understand it, is to allow all who have surplus currency on hand that they do not need for present use to go to the national Treasury and deposit it there, and receive from the Treasurer certificates of loan or bonds bearing a low but fixed rate of interest, say 3.65 per cent.; and when they find they can use the money to return to the Treasurer, deliver the bonds, and receive their face amount with the accrued interest. In the language of a New York writer on political economy:

> In this interchange of currency for bonds and bonds for currency they discern a subtle principle that will regulate the movements of finance and commerce as accurately as the motion of the steam-engine is regulated by its governor.

Two objections to this "subtle principle" present themselves at once: the first is that the whole volume of the currency will not be enlarged by this process, and consequently the extra amount of paper money sought for by the friends of an elastic currency will not be obtained; and the second is, that the Government will be made the custodian of the people's idle funds, and will have to pay interest for the privilege of holding them without receiving any equivalent. Being payable on demand the Government could not safely use the deposited currency in the payment of any of its debts, because it must be ready to pay out that currency whenever demanded; and occasions would arise, such as the last panic disclosed, when the whole amount of deposited currency would be called for and would find the Government unprepared to refund.

If, however, the system contemplates that the people shall have more currency as they think they need it, on a convertible 3.65 per cent. loan, as is suggested by my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. KELLEY] and others, the Government must issue the new kind of loan so as to be accessible to the people. For what purpose would it issue it? If the revenues of the country are sufficient, with economy and moderate appropriations, to pay its current expenses and interest on the debt as they have been and still ought to be, the only other purpose for which it could be issued would be to redeem the 6 per cent. bonds.

The 6 per cents, if overdue, must be redeemed in gold or its equivalent, and in redeeming them in the 3.65 per cent. loan the nation must lose the difference between the value of the new loan in the market and the value of the 6 per cents, whatever that might be—perhaps not over 70 per cent. in the market.

An enlarged issue of currency interchanged for those bonds or any part thereof, when returned to the Treasury, might afford temporary relief, but at the same time it would be simply inflation, causing a rise in prices, and that rise would then require the whole amount thus issued to transact the business of the country at the increased prices the inflation had made; this "elastic currency" would never contract, and money would appear to be as scarce as ever; it would not be returned to the Treasury in exchange for the 3.65 per cents, for its use would be worth more than the interest on that loan. Such has been the experience of the country under the old banking system, under which the currency was so elastic that the banks had no difficulty in issuing all that the business channels of the nation could possibly be forced to absorb, and such it would be again.

In addition to the mischiefs of the inflation, the depositors of the bonds would be receiving 3.65 per cent. interest over and above all they could make from the use of the currency thus drawn from the national Treasury, giving them a far greater advantage than the national banks have at the present time.

It is contended, however, that in dull times the currency would be returned and the bonds withdrawn from the Treasury as a safe investment for idle money. As, however, it is contemplated that they may be used as a bank reserve, they would drift into the bankers' vaults, releasing an equal amount in greenbacks, and thus adding to the inflation of the currency; for the legal-tenders thus released would undoubtedly be invested, and most probably on loans "at call," with a perpetuation of the mischiefs we have so recently suffered.

The plan suggested would be a valuable one to the stock-jobbers and speculators of Wall street, and enable them to make "corners" with more facility than now. A few of them could join together and collect millions in greenbacks, and hand them to the Treasurer and receive bonds for them. This withdrawal of the currency would make a stringency in the money market; the prices of stocks and loans would fall; and when they had fallen to a satisfactory point the speculators would suddenly return their bonds to the Treasury, demand and receive their currency, with interest added, and before the public was aware could have it invested, through their brokers, in stocks and loans at the average low figures they had caused. The demand thus made would create a rise in prices, and in a few weeks they could sell out their purchases again at an advance; and thus they could repeat the operation from time to time, to their own profit and the loss of the people, while the Treasury of the nation, without receiving any benefit, would pay them, in the shape of interest on their deposited bonds, for their shrewdness in the operation. They could well afford to pay a heavy bonus for the establishment of such a system of watered currency.

Another scheme for the production of "an elastic currency" is advocated in what is called "free banking."

It sounds well and seems very proper that one man should have as good a chance to make money by banking as another. It savors of opposition to monopoly, and monopolies are always odious. This project, as I understand it, is, that every association of half a dozen or more persons may deposit United States bonds with the Comptroller of the Currency and receive circulating notes to a certain amount, say 90 per cent. of the bonds deposited, under the same restrictions and taxes as are imposed on the national banks. Under this system bank-notes could be issued to the amount of the bonds that would be collected together in this country; which amount, deducting the bonds already held for the basis of currency, and that held in Europe, would not be less than $500,000,000.

The volume of currency would then be swelled to that amount if the business of the country could be made to absorb it, and it would absorb it to a large extent; for every new emission, by adding to the volume of circulation, would cheapen its value, as I have said before, and as that value became reduced, more of it would be required to do the work of the people, until it would become almost worthless, and finally reduce us to general bankruptcy.

Either of these last two systems would produce a well-watered currency, but it could not be dried again, except through the hot influence of suspension of payments. They seem to me about as judicious as to permit individuals to coin dollars of such weight and fineness as they might choose.

This idea of "an elastic currency" is not new. The old banking system was based on it; but it did not prevent evils like those we are now suffering. Under the old system the banks had the power to issue currency—"to move the crops" when they needed moving—to an almost unlimited extent, and could withdraw it when that end was accomplished. But the enlarged volume of "elastic currency" was not contracted voluntarily; it kept on increasing; the "governor" got out of order, and the extended line of credit was not shortened, except by the forcible intervention of a suspension of specie payments, such as were in May, 1837; in October, 1839; in February, 1841, and in September, 1857.

After each of those suspensions no resumption of specie payments was reached until there had been a severe contraction of the currency, just as the effort to reach a resumption of payments, even in paper money, is causing a severe contraction now. An illustration or two may be worthy of notice here.

General Jackson vetoed the recharter of the United States Bank in July, 1832, and Secretary Taney removed the deposits from that bank in September, 1833, recommending at the same time to the deposit banks to be liberal in their discounts to the mercantile and commercial community. The pet banks were not slow to take the hint, and the stimulus thus given commenced a system of inflation by the increase of the number of banks and the expansion of bank credits.

Thus, the banks increased in number from 506 in January, 1834, to 758 in January 1837; the circulation increased during the same time from ninety-four to one hundred and forty-nine millions, or 58 per cent.; the deposits increased from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty-seventy millions, or nearly 70 per cent.; the loan and discount line increased from three hundred and thirty to five hundred and thirty-seven millions, or 62 per cent.; while the specie actually decreased from forty-three millions in 1835 to thirty-eight millions in 1837.

At this latter date everything seemed prosperous; the "elastic currency" was expanding; business was active; manufactures were lively; imports were large, and in five years (from 1832 to 1836, inclusive) exceeded the exports by one hundred and forty-three millions; the sales of public lands were enormous; and General Jackson in his farewell address, when about vacating the presidential chair, congratulated the people that he left this great nation prosperous and happy. Somehow or other the "governor" of the elastic currency, which had curved out so largely, got out of order. Some of the cog-wheels broke; and in seventy days after the address a suspension of specie payments by the banks had ensued from one end of the Union to the other. Then began the issue of shin-plasters, with which the country was flooded, to make change—from the dollar and fractional notes of cities, counties, and towns, redeemable in payment of taxes, down to the issue of the village tavern-keeper, whose dimes were redeemable in sherry-cobblers, and his half-dimes payable in a drink of whisky.

The inward curve of the "elastic currency" then commenced as necessary toward resumption, and by it came contraction and suffering. From January, 1837, to January, 1838, the currency was contracted from one hundred and forty-nine millions to one hundred and sixteen millions—a heavy contraction for that day—and the discount line from five hundred and thirty-seven millions to five hundred and nineteen millions, and multitudes were reduced from comfort to poverty.

The banks resumed in May and August, 1838, but again suspended in October, 1839, and after a feeble attempt at resumption in 1841 failed again, and did not fully resume until March, 1842.

The preparation for the last resumption was a severe one, for the banks reduced their circulation from January, 1840, to January, 1843, about $49,000,000, and withdrew from the people's use, in loans and discounts, $223,000,000.

As soon, however, as the severity of that resumption was over the banks again began the process of inflation, and gradually swelled their circulation from fifty-eight millions in 1843 to two hundred and fourteen millions in 1857, or 270 per cent.; and their loan and discount account from two hundred and eighty-two to seven hundred and forty-three millions, or 164 per cent.; while their specie only increased from thirty-three to fifty-eight millions, or 76 per cent. This great expansion of the credit system was not called for by the legitimate wants of the people, and the result was another suspension of the banks in October, 1857, to be followed by another contraction of banking credits, and confusion, distress, ruin, and despair, as before.

During this period Indiana was under a free-banking law, and the notes of one-half of her banks were at a discount ranging from 5 to 70 per cent. New York, too, had her free-bank system, based on her State bonds and on national loans; yet her system did comparatively little toward "regulating the currency" in 1857, for her banks were the first to suspend and drag nearly all the rest of the banks down with them. A cog-wheel had again been broken in their "governor."

England underwent a similar experience to our own. She was under an irredeemable currency from 1797 to 1822. She had reached the maximum of inflation in 1814, when the combined circulation of the Bank of England and the country banks amounted to £70,000,000. At the resumption in 1822 she had reduced her circulation down to £25,000,000; making a reduction of currency, in eight years, of about $215,000,000. She, too, had overtraded greatly.

From these illustrations it will be seen that the "elastic currency" of the old banking system brought about inflations that necessarily produced suspensions, because of overtrading, and these suspensions had to be followed by severe contractions, which occasioned a vast amount of distress in all the business circles of the country.

As these evils arose under banks that had some legislative check on them, what evils would not befall us under a system where the inflation of the currency would have no check upon it except the inability of the banks to buy more bonds upon which to base fresh issues of currency!

The advocates of free banking and cheap money are clamorous for more issues of paper currency. They assume that if a little money is a good thing, a good deal of it is much better. They forget the fact that every new issue tends to raise prices and enhance values, and thus requires an additional emission to do the work of exchanging commodities. Notable examples thereof may be found in the experience of our own country in the revolutionary war, when paper money was issued in such abundance that $337,000,000 were put in circulation, and the amount became so great that prices rose to an extraordinary figure; money seemed to be scarce; more became necessary to effect the exchange of commodities, and was issued accordingly, until the whole mass had reached the amount above mentioned, and finally became utterly worthless.

In January, 1777, it required $1.50 of paper to purchase a silver dollar, but so rapidly did the depreciation increase that in February, 1781, it took seventy-five dollars in paper to purchase a dollar in specie.

The follqwing bill of items, taken from Lossing's Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution, shows the depreciation of our currency in 1781. The Clerk will please to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Captain A. MCLANE, bought of W. NICHOLLS:

January 5, 1781:

1 pair boots	$600
6¾ yard colico, at $85	752
6 yards chintz, at $150	900
4½ yards moreen, at $100	450
4 handkerchiefs, at $100	400
8 yards quality binding, at $4	32
1 skein silk	10

If paid in specie £18 10*s*.
Received payment in full, for William Nicholls,

JONA. JONES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. France, during her revolution, was reduced to a still more unfortunate condition; for in her great wars with the "banded nations" of Europe she had recourse to an "elastic currency," secured on and redeemable in the confiscated church lands and lands of the emigrant nobility and in dues to the government; but the issue increased with the necessities of the nation until 250 francs in assignats were required to purchase a single franc in silver.

How impotent all the power of the most despotic governments is to keep at par an undue issue of paper money is most fully shown in French history. Alison says:

Though this depreciation [just stated] was unavoidable, the Convention endeavored to arrest it, and enacted the punishment of six years in prison against any who should exchange any quantity of silver or gold for a greater nominal value of assignats, or should ask a larger price for any article of merchandise if the price was paid in paper than if paid in the precious metals..

The Convention "condemned to twenty years of irons every person convicted of refusing payment of any debt in assignats or entering into any transaction in which they were received at less than their nominal value," yet this extreme punishment did not keep them at that value. In 1795 "bread was exposed to sale at twenty-two francs the pound, and what formerly cost 100 francs was now raised to 4,000. In the course of the year the depreciation beame such that 28,000 francs were exchanged for a louis d'or, and a dinner for five or six persons cost 60,000 francs, or $10,000 in our money.

The Confederate States, too, tried the experiment of extensive issues of paper money; and long before the ruling spirits of the Southern Confederacy had despaired of the contest their money had depreciated so far that it was facetiously said down there that when it was first issued men carried their money in their pockets to market and brought their marketing home in their baskets, but the depreciation became so great that the situation was reversed, and they took their money to market in their baskets and brought their marketing home in their pockets.

With these familiar examples of the effect of overissues of paper money before us, let us learn wisdom by their experience, and not be too hasty in making a further inflation of our paper currency, which would be the prolific parent of innumerable financial ills.

Besides all these objections there is a constitutional provision that should have great weight in our action on the subject.

Because of the existence of three or four banks in different States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the General Government did not take charge of the paper currency of the country, but intrusted it to the action of the State Legislatures through their chartered banks. The effect of such action was the infliction on the people of the nation of a currency of unequal value, and which bore oppressively on the citizens of many of the States because of such inequality.

Now, the furnishing of a sound currency to a people is an attribute of sovereignty, and, at the same time, the highest duty of government. It is a power that should never be delegated so as to be beyond the government's control.

The Constitution says that Congress shall have power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." Under this and another clause of the Constitution, authorizing Congress to pass all laws necessary to execute its enumerated powers, Congress claims the right to issue its greenbacks and make them a legal tender, and also to authorize the national banks to issue notes and make them a tender to a certain extent. It has thus resumed the power granted in the Constitution, but so long allowed to be lodged within the legislation of the States. It now "regulates" the currency, decides from time to time on its volume, and prevents inordinate expansion. If Congress should pass a free banking law or an "interchangeability" law, the volume of the currency would be no more under its control; there would be no "governor" to "regulate" and keep it steady, and its amount would only be determined by the speculative tendencies of the people, and the desire of "bloated bondholders" to reap large profits from their bonds and the notes issued upon them. Banks would spring up at every cross-roads; the two thousand banks now existing would soon be doubled in number, each striving to make profit by extending its issues to the full extent allowed by law; and having no guiding hand nor controlling power over them, they would be as helpless to regulate the currency as would an army composed only of companies and officered by captains to win a battle over an organized and brigaded enemy.

Under such a system specie payments would be impossible; all currency would be irredeemable paper money; there could be no practicable redemption—no touch-stone whereby to ascertain the extent of the poison that would be infused into the veins of circulation, and, consequently, nothing to warn the country of approaching danger. As all the banks would be rivals in the work of pushing out their circulating notes they would be expanding together, and in some degree proportionately few of them would feel the effect of the increasing volume of currency except in the rise of prices, and as that would seem to indicate prosperity it would occasion no alarm.

This prosperity would continue until some great banks or mercantile establishments overtrading in their line of business, and not getting prompt returns for their investments, would fail to meet their obligations, and being connected with others would bring them also down, and the influence of the failures would continue to extend until the whole country would be involved in financial ruin.

The facility with which paper money is issued is so attractive to legislative bodies that they too frequently attempt to escape present ills by additional issues of currency; but a nation that goes on increasing its depreciated paper currency is on the high road to national repudiation, of which our revolutionary history and the French revolution, already mentioned, are notable examples.

But it is said that the currency of the nation is inadequate to its present wants, and that it is financially illogical to expect that the amount that was thought to be necessary to transact the business of the country nine years ago is sufficient now when we have advanced greatly in property and population. The answer to that doctrine will be found in the fact that the great demand of the General Government during the rebellion for everything that was directly or indirectly necessary to carry on the contest enhanced the prices of all those commodities, and the sudden addition of a large amount of bank-notes and greenbacks inflated prices still more, and thus there was required a much larger volume of currency to effect the transactions of the nation while in that abnormal state than was necessary in ordinary times.

Since the contest has ended and business affairs have resumed more of their normal condition there has been a great shrinkage of values; the prices of the great staples of wool, cotton, iron, wheat, sugar, &c., have fallen from 20 to 50 per cent., and the same amount of currency that was required during our national troubles is abundantly sufficient now to make all the transfers of the property of the people, although that property may have been largely increased in quantity.

The whole bank-note circulation of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in 1844 was only £28,000,000, and in 1872, twenty-eight years thereafter, it had only increased to £30,000,000, although the commerce of the nation had been greatly enlarged. The whole circulation of that kingdom, both of paper and gold, does not to-day exceed $600,000,000, although her foreign commerce is two and a half times as great as ours, while our authorized circulation is over $750,000,000.

In this connection it is important to remember that the currency of a country performs but an insignificant portion of the exchanges of the property of the people. The best writers on the subject say that in countries like England and our own it does not perform more than one-fifth part of such exchanges, and those principally of the retail trade. The remainder is done by bank credits, by loans and discounts, the greater part of which, especially in cities, assume the form of deposits, and are passed from hand to hand by checks in dealings and settlements.

The fact that the clearing-house of New York alone for the last ten years made daily exchanges to the average amount of ninety-six millions, nearly equal to one-seventh of our circulation, which were all settled with an average of three and a half millions daily, mostly paid in checks or clearing-house certificates, demonstrates the great influence bank credits have in performing the business of the country; and the additional fact that bank loans have expanded in eight years from $500,000,000 to $940,000,000, while the currency was stationary, shows that there had been not only enough, but too much of credit infused into our business affairs.

If it were not so, why should greenbacks be worth only ninety cents on the dollar? Their depreciation in former years arose from two causes. One was the sudden issue of large masses of greenbacks and bank-notes on the community, and the other was the doubt that existed in the midst of the great conflict whether they would ever be redeemed. The latter doubt has been removed, and the credit of the Government is such that it has been enabled to reduce $250,000,000 of its 6 per cent. loan to 5 per cent., being a figure below what individuals generally have to pay.

The only remaining reason of its depreciation must be that it continues in excess of the legitimate wants of the nation, and that its payment is indefinitely postponed. Its supposed scarcity arises from a want of confidence among the people which causes hoarding for the time; with confidence restored it will be as plenty as ever; but to add to its bulk while thus depreciated will only be to exaggerate existing evils by depreciating it still further.

It is the experience of modern commercial nations that the best method of sustaining a sound and even paper currency is by requiring its redemption in coin. So long as it is thus redeemable it approximates to a stable value, but as soon as it ceases to be redeemable it fluctuates in value, and the prices of all commodities that are measured by it become uncertain. It is then as if our yard-stick should vary in length, or our bushel measure should vary in capacity from day to day.

An irredeemable currency (always fluctuating in value) bears hardest on the laboring classes, for while it is expanding and contracting, their wages mostly remain stationary. Its fluctuations induce speculative enterprises, raise and lower prices of the necessaries of life, and as it increases in volume it makes vast fortunes for the few, while its shrinkage brings ruin on the many. Its tendency is to increase imports and discourage exports, and thus to augment the balances of trade against us in foreign countries.

It is contended by some that we have a currency of our own that answers our purposes in the exchange of commodities, and that we need no other. This reason might be a sound one, perhaps, if we were so isolated as to hold no intercourse with foreign nations.

The savage tribes of Africa may have a sufficient home currency in their cowries or shell-money, but when they purchase cotton cloths or arms from Europeans their currency will not avail in payment, and they must return something of intrinsic value in the commercial world, and sought by all, such as gold-dust or ivory.

We are not isolated by a surrounding Chinese wall, but constitute a member of the great family of nations, holding commercial intercourse with them all. In our dealings with them we can exchange our commodities for theirs, but if there should be a balance due to either party, that balance must be liquidated in the only medium recognized by all civilized countries—gold or silver—because all dealings between nations are made with reference to them as the measure of values.

Our foreign commerce, through our exports and imports, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, exceeded $1,200,000,000, all of which was valued in specie currency and not by our national paper money. Under a commercial necessity we paid in the liquidation of balances due by us abroad $66,000,000 in gold and silver coin and bullion for that fiscal year, being a sum considerably beyond the annual product of our mines.

This metallic currency not only affects the price of imports and exports, but also affects the price of all other commodities that are exchanged therefor. Thus that currency exerts its influence on a large portion of the articles that enter into the uses of our every-day life; and as in our internal affairs we buy and sell with the paper dollar, which, as measured by gold, varies every hour, the result is that no one making a contract to be consummated a day thereafter can tell what he may have to pay or to receive, or whether he will gain or lose when such a contract shall be fulfilled. The merchant with his merchandise, the farmer with his produce, the mechanic for his wages, are all uncertain as to their remuneration, and buy and sell and labor under a currency as restless as the waves of the sea, and sometimes as destructive in its inflations and contractions as the ocean in a storm. No one is benefited by its unceasing changes save the stock-gambler, the broker, and speculator, the stormy petrels of an irredeemable currency, who are happiest and most prosperous when its fluctuations are greatest and most disastrous to the people at large.

The national industry, and the plighted word of the nation, whose Congress has said "that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes," alike demand that the earliest practicable measures should be taken to redeem that solemn pledge.

Hence the importance of a return to specie payments cannot be exaggerated; and although the inflationists seem to think that by present moderate expansion that end may be attained, yet it seems to me that to attempt to correct the evil results of undue inflation, or to bring about resumption by the issue of additional paper money, now worth only ninety cents to the dollar, would be about as wise as to endeavor to enhance the price of wheat or corn by producing extra crops, or to extinguish a conflagration by a stream of coal-oil.

The road to specie payments is always a very rugged one. That result can only be reached by suffering. It has always been so heretofore; it must be so again. All rapid fluctuations in the value of the medium of payments will affect somebody. When our currency during the rebellion was rapidly inflated it depreciated in value; prices rose, debtors paid their obligations in notes worth from forty to sixty cents on the dollar, and the creditor suffered, and all persons living on annuities and other fixed incomes were reduced to straitened circumstances. As the currency contracts the contrary effect is felt; the currency rises in value, there is a shrinkage of values of commodities, and the debtor finds his means of payment diminished, and he in his turn becomes the sufferer. It is the fear of this contraction that makes the people clamorous for more paper money, but specie payments can never be reached without such contraction or its equivalent, as our previous experience in our former resumptions has shown.

What then, it may be asked, are the means whereby we may obtain that only currency which will tend most to keep steady the values of property; give a sufficient medium of payment; prevent bank suspensions, and enable men to deal with each other with safety and security? The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last report, suggests the means therefor. He says:

> Should the national banks be prohibited from selling the coin received by them as interest upon bonds pledged to secure circulation, retaining the same in whole or in part in reserve or loaning it in the discount of bills and notes payable in coin, as Congress might prescribe, there would a be gradual accumulation of gold in the banks which would do something toward preparing for resumption.

I do not agree with him. When we remember that the whole amount of gold which we annually raise from our mines is used in payment of balances due to foreign countries and in the arts, the effect of such a policy may readily be foreseen.

The whole amount of gold in the Treasury, banks, and country at large, is estimated by the Director of the Mint at $140,000,000. The interest we annually pay in coin to the banks is nearly $24,000,000. The annual abstraction of that amount from its accustomed channels and hiding it in bank vaults would raise the price of gold in two ways: first, by the increasing scarcity of gold; and, secondly, by the expansion of the paper currency released from the reserves to the amount of the gold thus retained in the banks. The difficulty of obtaining gold would increase with each payment of interest to the banks, until the price would rise to a ruinous premium. This state of affairs would reduce the volume of imports, and consequently reduce the revenues derived from that source, until we would again have to resort to internal taxation to obtain the means to pay our interest. It is only by the constant circulation of gold that our merchants are enabled to obtain it to pay duties.

It is true, as the Secretary says, that by his plan "it would accumulate in the banks," but at the same time it would be withdrawn from the people, with the result as I have stated. The only means whereby the banks and the Treasury can be filled with sufficient gold to resume specie payments is to turn the balance of our trade with foreign countries in our favor, and thus prevent the annual drain of gold from our shores.

To reach specie payments we must first reform the errors that have crept into our banking system.

We must make it a penal offense, punishing severely the offending officer who willfully and knowingly certifies checks when there is no money in the bank to meet them. The law of 1869, passed to prevent that very mischief, is disregarded, and has been allowed to remain a dead letter until recently. The Comptroller has, however, two cases of delinquencies in hand, and proposes to prosecute them with vigor. I trust he will.

We must prevent, by proper penalties, the payment by banks of interest on deposits. The practice is pernicious in the highest degree. Banks should be lenders, not borrowers. The surplus balances of the country banks should not be allowed to be decoyed to New York, for the purpose of enabling Wall-street operators to carry out their speculations to the disturbance of the business of the nation. They should be kept for their customers at home.

The New York clearing-house committee, in their recent admirable report, expose these dangerous practices and condemn them in the proper terms, and recommend their abandonment, but there are some national banks which think their profit lies in their continuance and will not abandon them. Congress must, therefore, lay its hand on them, and restrain them by appropriate legislation.

As a matter of self-defense and public benefit the banks, especially of great cities, where runs on them first commence, should open two kinds of deposit accounts with their customers. One should be a "cash account," payable on demand in greenbacks or national-bank notes; the other a "credit account," payable in checks receivable through the clearing-house, and receivable in payment of debts due the banks. The committee of the clearing-house see the eminent propriety of such a distinction, and timidly allude to it, but fear to recommend it in the present state of financial affairs. It is, however, very just and proper. Able writers have heretofore advocated it by unanswerable arguments; but the banks fear innovation on established usage, and hesitate to adopt it.

Mr. Colwell, in his Ways and Means of Payment, (page 408,) says:

> We have said, and the figures we have adduced show, that convertibility of the notes and deposits of our banks is impossible, even when the banks are in the best condition; and that this must continue to be the case, constituted as the banks of the United States are, is as certain. The main feature of the business of these banks is the discount of notes maturing at a future time. We have previously assumed that the average time to run of the paper thus discounted is ninety days, or one-fourth of a year. They issue to the parties at whose instance these discounts are made their notes, payable on demand, or give them credit on their books for the proceeds, payable in like manner on demand.
> The deposits of the banks are made up almost altogether from the notes thus issued and the credits thus granted. The circulation and deposits of 1856 amounted to $445,000,000, for which the banks, by this mode of doing business, became liable on demand; that is, they received from their customers claims on the public, maturing in three months, and they became liable to pay a certain amount on demand—in the year 1856, for instance, in every three months $445,000,000, and in 1857 in every like period $500,000,000.
> The paper discounted by the banks, not being payable on demand, would only be paid and could only be demanded as it matured from day to day. Whether the sums thus paid into the banks were eight or ten millions daily, it was all the banks could exact, and if the notes had not been discounted, the amount required to pay them would have been the same. But the banks became liable to the payment of $445,000,000 to $500,000,000 in any one day in 1856 and 1857—a position, stripped of the mists and prejudices which constantly surround it, which should be called, as it really is, stupendously absurd; and, in times of commercial revulsion, not less dangerous than absurd.

I need only add that to meet these immediate liabilities the banks only had in 1856 specie to the amount of $58,000,000, and in 1857 to the amount of $74,000,000, to show the force of his reasoning.

A still earlier writer, Mr. J. S. Gibbons, in his Banks of New York and the Panic of 1857, (pages 389–390,) says:

There are certain anomalies in force as applied to banks by which they are exposed to extreme liabilities, not only in seasons of pressure, but at all times. By a strange absurdity of law the deposits of a bank are held to be payable in specie on demand, although the amount of specie in the whole country is not sufficient to pay the one-twentieth part of them. It is, therefore, plain that the banks might be forced into suspension by the depositors at any moment, without regard to the state of the market.

The actual relation between the bank and the dealer gives no color of right to the latter to demand specie for his deposit. He is fully aware that the bank does not consider itself holden for the coin. He does not give coin, and why should he take it? He deposits a form of credit, or individual currency, checks. When this form of currency sinks in general depreciation, by what rule of consistency or justice can he require the bank to fill up the deficit? The depreciation originates with the dealer in the excess of trade, and not with the bank. It may encourage the excess by loaning too freely, but the dealer is not obliged to borrow. There is obviously no propriety in his loading the bank with the ill consequences of his own action; yet such is the accepted rule.

In Mr. Gibbons's more recent work on the United States Debt, Finances, and Taxation, (page 204,) he says:

This reasoning brings us to the necessity of a radical change in the constitution of banks; and that is the repeal of all laws which impose the redemption of pure forms of credit in specie. Nothing can be more anomalous than the requirement that a bank shall pay its deposits in gold, and nothing so unjust to labor. The theory runs into the extremest absurdities the moment it is put into practice. While it is not enforceable by law that one bank shall redeem the notes of another, the latter may be deposited in account, and the check of the depositor is then allowed to enforce payment in specie. If a bank be liberal enough to its dealers to discount their promissory notes exchanged with each other on the basis of pure credit, they have the legal right to demand specie for the proceeds in the same hour; and this in spite of the prior obligation of the bank to pay specie for its circulating bills, the holders of which are then cheated out of their rights. * * *

Any organization of our finances, with this root of error at the bottom, will put the whole system of commerce at the risk of perpetual disturbances and bring defeat at last.

I am not aware of any law which prevents the banks from making such contracts with their creditors; but if there is, it should be remedied by congressional legislation, for it is the depositors of banks, and not the note-holders, who make runs and cause suspensions.

In addition to these reforms in the banking system, we must reform ourselves. We must adopt the plain and simple rules of retrenchment, frugality, and economy. We have lived too fast, and beyond our means. As a nation, we are the most extravagant people in the world. The high prices engendered by the necessities of the Government and the vast fortunes made out of contracts have demoralized the people, and the average yearly expenditures of families are far in excess of what they were but a few years ago. The inflation of the currency, the ease with which money could be obtained, and the inordinate expansion of the loan and deposit lines of the banks were powerful inducements to all kinds of speculations in stocks, bonds, railroads, manufactures, mines, &c., and the sad consequences of which are daily seen in the failure of great manufacturing and mercantile establishments, in the breaking of banks, and the defalcation of officers in places of financial responsibility.

As a nation, too, we have overtraded; and for many years we have been regularly running in debt to foreign countries, until our debt abroad is estimated to exceed $2,000,000,000, involving the necessity of paying interest to foreigners to the amount of $100,000,000 a year.

Before we can reach permanent specie payments all this must be reformed. As a nation and as individuals, we will have to reduce our expenditures; we must buy less from and sell more to foreign countries, and must so manage our agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, that the balance of the foreign trade shall be in our favor; we must increase our stock of coin; it does not amount to one hundred and forty millions all told—it goes out of the country to pay balances as fast as it is mined—while our circulation and deposits amount to over thirteen hundred millions. We should also fix a reasonably distant day for the Government to resume, and make our preparations accordingly.

Our paper currency is the best we ever had; it is uniform in value all over the Union, and if not inflated by the "interchangeability" principle or "free banking," it will within a reasonable time be at par. It was carefully hoarded during the late suspension of payments, and for two reasons. One was that its ultimate redemption was secured, and the other was that there was nothing else to hoard; for specie has long since left the channels of circulation. Confidence (on which the credit system is based) is returning to men, and the symptoms are that money will very soon be as abundant as ever, as the movement of the New York money market shows.

The National Board of Trade, at its late session in Baltimore, just closed, deprecates the further issue of irredeemable paper money; it calls for the withdrawal and cancellation of the forty-four million reserve, and strict economy in the appropriations. With all these recommendations I heartily agree, but from its recommendations that the banks should hoard their gold interest I must dissent, for the reason already given.

Let us, then, let well enough alone. The currency question is chiefly a commercial question and not a legislative one, and until the currency reaches a point, either by gradual contraction of bank credits or by its absorption by the business of the country in its daily exchanges, so as not to be in excess, we can neither have the balance of trade in our favor nor sustain specie payment. Then, and not till then, can the Government, after proper preparation, resume. It must resume first and then the banks can easily follow.

"Economy, retrenchment, and reform" must be the motto of individuals and of the nation, and until these are adopted and carried into practice we must expect to blunder on, under a fluctuating currency, sometimes exalting us to a pinnacle of seeming prosperity and sometimes plunging us into the depths of financial despair.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HAMILTON.]

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] when he last spoke upon the so-called civil-rights bill, referred to the fact that no member from the North had spoken against the measure, and that the entire opposition came from the South, assuming that no opposition existed against the proposed legislation at the North. For the purpose of dispelling that assumption, as well as to express what I believe to be the disapprobation of the people of my State, and some of the serious objections to the measure, I desire to submit a few remarks. The bill proposes to enact as follows:

That whoever, being a corporation or natural person, and owner, or in charge of any public inn; or of any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required; or of any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight; or of any cemetery, or other benevolent institutions, or any public school supported, in whole or in part, at public expense or by endowment for public use, shall make any distinction as to admission or accommodation therein, of any citizen of the United States, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars for each offense; and the person or corporation so offending shall be liable to the citizens thereby injured, in damages to be recovered in an action of debt.

SEC. 2. That the offenders under this act, and actions to recover damages, may be prosecuted before any territorial, district, or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes at the place where the offense was charged to have been committed as well as in the district where the parties may reside, as now provided by law.

This bill is a very extraordinary measure; it seeks to efface the natural distinction between black and white; to wipe out all the conventionalities of life; to bring about, as it were, a new creation. Coming from any other source than the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] it might seem quite chimerical; but the gentleman from Massachusetts is a very extraordinary man. If not possessed of the power to work miracles, he certainly does possess the power to work very marvelous changes, especially in himself.

In 1860 the gentleman and myself were fellow-democrats in the memorable democratic convention at Charleston—he as delegate from Massachusetts, acting with and standing by the extreme slaveholders of the South, voting persistently for their candidate for President, Jefferson Davis, on every ballot, (some fifty-odd, I think,) sustaining them in their claim to the right to extend slavery into the Territories, and to be protected therein by the power of the Federal Government; while I, as delegate from New Jersey, was voting with the friends of Stephen A. Douglas for his nomination, and contending for the doctrine of non-intervention by the Federal Government—upon which Mr. Buchanan had been elected—leaving the people in the Territories to determine for themselves whether they would or would not have slavery.

That convention by a large majority refused to sanction the claim for intervention in behalf of slavery in the Territories. The extremists seceded from the convention, nominated Mr. Breckinridge—thereby elected Mr. Lincoln; then urged his election as a ground of secession, and thus inaugurated the terrible war of the rebellion; this worked the extinguishment of slavery, and produced a great reaction in the political status of parties.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, having swung off to the extreme tension of the pendulum in favor of slavery, has vibrated in the other direction to the extreme end of the pendulum in favor of the colored race. From an out and out State-rights democrat he has become an out and outer republican, aiding to tread State rights under foot. From the champion of the slaveholders, he has become the especial champion of the negroes, their great captain-general in command of the forces, to carry through this House the unwarrantable, inexpedient, and unconstitutional bill under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is objectionable, not only because it seeks to eradicate and strike down all the distinctions of social life and intercourse which are essential to every well-ordered civil community, but because it is another grasp to enlarge the already enormous centralized power of the Federal Government which the dominant party in Congress has been yearly augmenting, and by which they have overridden the State governments, and divested the people within them to a large extent of the inestimable right of self-government. A similar domination and assumption of authority by the British government over the colonists forced them into the Revolution.

Our forefathers will have fought in vain for the principle and right of self-government (as far as the people of the several States are concerned) if the Federal Government shall assume to regulate the internal affairs of the States, as it has of late years done and is now doing.

As a Jerseyman, representing a portion, and as I believe in this respect a large majority, of the honest, right-minded people of the true and conservative old State of New Jersey—the first among all the States to establish an independent constitution and government for herself—I protest against this legislation as an innovation upon, and an abridgment of, their inherent right of self-government. They are competent to regulate their own internal affairs for themselves, and I protest against the right of Massachusetts, or of all New England, to do it for them. Their fathers were unwilling that Old England should do so, and they will never consent that New England shall. The defamers of New Jersey sometimes deridingly say, "She is out of the Union." As far as her domestic affairs are concerned she prefers to be considered out of the Union. All she asks is to be let alone. She has shown herself capable of self-government, and is quite willing to contrast her past record or present position with Massachusetts or South Carolina, or any of the States whose Representatives are pressing this legislation upon her people.

It is a reproach and an insult to the people of New Jersey that Federal laws, Federal courts, and Federal officials must be set over them to regulate their domestic affairs, to conduct their common schools, their public conveyances, their hotels, their cemeteries, &c., as this bill proposes to do.

The astute gentleman from Massachusetts in advocating this measure did not direct us to any authority, or any supposed authority, within the Constitution to warrant the proposed legislation. If to be found anywhere, it must be within the scope of the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth article of amendments. The thirteenth simply prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude, with power to enforce that prohibition; the authority for this legislation is not there.

The first section of the fourteenth amendment declares that—

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

It will be observed that the prohibition contained in that section is that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, &c. When any State shall make or enforce any law contrary to the provisions of that section, the citizens affected thereby must treat it as a nullity, and, if need be, bring the matter before the Supreme Court of the United States to be righted. But it will be seen that the Constitution does not act upon corporations or individuals; they are not prohibited from making a distinction between citizens in their relations with them, nor is any power given to Congress to enact laws upon that subject.

If any corporation or person shall deny to any citizen, or prohibit him from enjoying any privilege or immunity to which he is entitled, the laws of the country, common to all, afford him relief.

The section in question did not confer upon the citizens of the United States any privileges or immunities not before enjoyed by them, nor did it intend to do so; it simply declared who should be citizens of the United States, namely, all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. It did not even grant the right to vote; it left the regulation of the franchise, like all other civil State rights, with the States respectively, where it properly belonged and where it had always been controlled. If, as it now contended, Congress had power under the fourteenth amendment to provide by enactment that the colored citizens should enjoy every privilege and immunity which the white citizens of any State enjoyed, and to put them on an equality, why did not the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, or some other zealous friend of the colored man, bring in a bill to enforce the privilege of voting? Why go through the process of forcing through, as was done in many of the States, by fraud and coercion, the fifteenth amendment to give him that privilege which the white citizen enjoyed? The answer is obvious. The fourteenth amendment gave him no such privilege, did not put him in all things on an equality with the white citizen of the States respectively. The fourteenth amendment did create him a citizen with the privileges and immunities of a citizen of the United States, did secure to him life, liberty, and property, and the equal protection of the laws; all else it left to the States. Hence the necessity of the fifteenth amendment, which secured his right to vote by declaring that—

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

So far has the Constitution gone; no further. So much of the fourteenth amendment as made the colored people citizens of the United States was induced doubtless by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which had adjudged, in the Dred Scott case, that they were not citizens of the United States, and could not by reason thereof even prosecute an action in that court. The whole object of the first section of that amendment was to declare them citizens of the United States, and to prevent the States by law from interfering with their rights as such. When presented to the States for adoption it was openly declared in Congress and to the country, by the framers of it, that it did not and was not intended to interfere with the rights of the States to regulate their own internal affairs as they before had done; and it is perfectly plain from the amendment itself that it was not intended to confer upon the colored people any State right or privilege, because, as an inducement to the States to allow them to vote, the second section of that amendment regulates the representation in Congress upon the basis of those allowed to vote.

Some of the States did confer upon them the right of suffrage; but the dominant party in Congress, finding they were not likely to secure the control of the Southern States without the negro vote, in order to secure it, and thus secure and continue their ascendency, presented the fifteenth amendment for ratification. By force of the so-called reconstruction laws, denying to such States as did not adopt it any representation in Congress, or any voice in the Government, and by means of the military and bogus governments set up in many of the Southern States, and by other means still less creditable, they succeeded in procuring its adoption; and by force thereof the important right of the elective franchise (which the people of Massachusetts will only permit those who can read the constitution to exercise in that State) was put into the hands of the hordes of poor, ignorant negroes just from the plantations, who, in the very nature of things, must have been totally devoid of every qualification for its exercise, while an immigrant to this country, be he ever so intelligent, much as he may have studied our Constitution and laws—coming from choice, with his kindred and means, investing, as he may, permanently in property and business—is not admitted to citizenship with the right to vote until after a residence of five years, proof of his fidelity to the country, and taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. If there is propriety in thus dealing with an immigrant, there would seem to have been much propriety in putting the negro under a similar probation. In the mean time he would have been put upon his own resources, learned something of the laws of the country, and acquired some little capacity fitting him to exercise the important right of voting.

When we consider what has been done for the colored people in the United States, taken, as they were, from a state of abject bondage, where they had no control of themselves or their children, the very property of others, liable to be sold and transferred at the will of their owners, and then made absolutely free, made citizens of the United States with the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, the males given the right to vote, having the complete control of several of the States, and holding the balance of power in many others, we would naturally conclude that if they had any sense of the principle of gratitude, they would be more gracious than to seek to force themselves into the society and association of the white people against their wishes, and to break down all the distinctions and conventionalities of life. We might justly suppose that white people had some rights and feelings they would be willing to respect; but it is not so. They are very much like certain animals which have been kept in servitude and confinement for a long time; they may be turned out into ever so broad a range, with the sweetest pastures, amid sparkling streams and cooling shades, with everything to supply their wants, and to make them comfortable, still they are restless and discontented; they break down the barrier of their inclosure, roam over the entire plantation, lay waste the grain-fields, invade the court-yard, despoil the flower-garden, and commit general destruction and damage. So it is with the colored people. Not content with the broad area of freedom, with a full voice in the governments, State and National; with all the pursuits of life open to them; with ample opportunity to supply all their wants, and to acquire and sit down under their own vine and fig-tree, with none to molest or make them afraid, they are still restless and discontented; they want to break down the barriers of society, force themselves into the highest seat in the synagogue, into association with the white people nolens volens, to invade the circles of the refined and fastidious, and to break down all the conventionalities of social life.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the other zealous friend of the colored people, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who desired the bill amended so that the negroes could have the benefit of the writ of mandamus to put them in the best traveling cars and place them in the best seats at the hotel tables, desire to be seated in the cars side by side with their colored friends, and wish to be sandwiched at each meal at the hotels between two negroes, doubtless they can be accommodated; nobody will object, and no law prohibit it; but that is purely a matter of taste; and they should not desire to force others whose tastes may differ into the acceptance of theirs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no prejudices against the colored people. We have but few in my district and they have been brought up in a state of freedom. We have had no slavery in New Jersey for several generations past; all blacks born since 1804 have been free; they have been educated and brought up to understand and practice the proprieties of life; they are civil and unobtrusive, and are dealt with accordingly. They are kindly treated, and all their rights are fully accorded to them. For the last three years preceding the present—more out of charity than otherwise—I kept in my employ an infirm old colored man as my coachman; I rode with him on the same seat of the carriage from choice, and treated him with the same or more consideration and respect than I would have treated a younger white man. Of course he was a republican; at each election it afforded him much gratification to balance off my vote with his; that was his right; it was cheerfully accorded to him; on no occasion did I attempt to control or influence his vote. I allude to this as evidence that it is not from any prejudice against the colored people that I oppose this bill, but from other and higher considerations. I oppose it because it is unwarranted by the Constitution, another grand stride at centralization, a usurpation of State rights and of the people's inherited right of self-government; and because it is legislation not demanded by any existing necessity; because it is unwise, will be productive of no good, and must only tend to evil results.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Slaughter-house cases (16 Wallace, 36) has given a construction to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, in my opinion conclusive against this legislation, and I beg to add a short synopsis of that case, and a few brief extracts from the opinion of the court which was delivered by Justice Miller:

The Legislature of Louisiana granted to a corporation the exclusive right to have and maintain slaughter-houses, landings for cattle, &c., within defined bounds, and prohibited all other persons from keeping or having slaughter-houses, landings, &c., for cattle within those limits, and required all cattle intended for slaughter to be brought to the slaughter-houses of the corporation, and authorized the corporation to exact certain fees for the use thereof; in other words, gave that corporation the monopoly thereof for twenty-five years.

It was claimed among other things that this grant was in violation of the thirteenth and fourteenth articles of amendments to the Constitution of the United States in that it created an involuntary servitude, forbidden by the thirteenth amendment; that it abridged the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; that it denied to the plaintiffs the equal protection of the laws; that it deprived them of their property without due process of law, contrary to the provisions of the first section of the fourteenth amendment.

The court held that the thirteenth amendment applied only to personal servitude, and not as attached to property.

As to the first section of the fourteenth amendment, namely: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," the court say, in reference to the first clause of that section:

"The first observation we have to make on this clause is that it puts to rest both the questions which we stated to have been the subject of differences of opinion. It declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and it overturns the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, citizens of the United States. That its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the United States there can be no doubt.

"The next observation is more important in view of the argument of counsel in the present case. It is, that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

"It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual. We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

"The language is, 'No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.' It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the term 'citizen of the State' should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to 'citizens of the United States,' in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose. Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of a State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment. If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of a State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment."

After referring to and enumerating the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, which are fundamental, and belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, the court say:

"Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

"All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. * * * We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them."

TRANSMISSION OF MAIL MATTER.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, early in the session I introduced into this House a bill to provide for the free transmission and free delivery of all newspapers within the counties where published, and free exchange of papers and periodicals between the publishers thereof.

There are many reasons why this bill, or some bill containing similar provisions, ought to become a law, but I shall ask the attention of the House to only one or two of them at this time.

The ax and the blow that were properly leveled at the franking privilege and its abuses unhappily, and perhaps inadvertently, struck this meritorious law, then in force, from the statute-books.

The franking privilege had been abused and often used for party and other improper purposes, as believed; and its abolition had been demanded by the national republican convention, and also, if I mistake not, by one or both of the branches of what became the coalition party; and Congress could do no less than abolish this obnoxious privilege.

The free circulation of papers in the counties where published, however, was no part of the franking privilege, and should never have shared its fortune. It stood upon different grounds and had different merits, was of more recent enactment, and the two measures were in no way connected; and why it was supposed that it deserved death at the hands of Congress, because of what was alleged to be the enormities of the obnoxious privilege, is not clearly understood.

I have no purpose to revive the franking privilege, which I am informed and convinced was a great annoyance and an onerous privilege to members of Congress, if privilege it might be called, which tended so much to increase their labors; but I have an earnest desire to aid in restoring this privilege to those who patronize the county press—however small it may be, yet valued by its recipients; valued for its convenience, and valued because it was, under the present postal arrangement, their right, as may well be claimed in a fair distribution of postal privileges. Under the present system of the postal service letter-carriers are employed by the Department at a liberal salary, payable monthly, in all the principal cities of the United States, who, at a great expense to the Department, and for the ease and convenience of the people of such cities, visit several times each day their dwellings and business houses, and deliver, free of any additional charge, not only their letters, but their newspapers and all other mail matter; and also take their mail matter from their homes and offices free of any additional charge, and deposit it in the mails.

This is, indeed, very convenient for the fortunate people of the cities, but is very expensive to the Post-Office Department, and is one of the principal items which make the expenses of that Department annually exceed its receipts.

Who pays this item of expense may well be asked, and it may be truly answered that all the people, whether of the city or country, help to pay it. And I claim that a large majority of them have no corresponding privilege or benefit with which to offset it.

Far be it from me to entertain any purpose or desire to abolish the free-delivery system in the cities. I am in favor of so organizing the postal service as to give to all the people, without any unjust discrimination, the cheapest, speediest, and most convenient means of transmitting intelligence and their messages from one to another; and at the same time make it as near self-sustaining as possible.

For this expensive privilege of free delivery enjoyed by the people of the cities, the people of the towns, villages, and country have no corresponding privilege or benefit, as I have said. Are they not just as worthy? They pay three cents postage on a letter, and the people in the city pay no more. Yet it costs the Government far more to handle the letter for the city than it does for the country.

The extra expense to the Post-Office Department for the free-carrier system in a single one of our larger cities would undoubtedly be greater than the expense of transmission and delivery of newspapers in all the counties of the Union under this bill.

It would appear to me, Mr. Speaker, that no gentleman on this floor representing a city constituency can with consistency or any degree of fairness withhold his willing support to this bill.

Our present postal service stretches out its accommodating arms to each man's door in the city, and receives and delivers his mail without any additional charge; and yet, in the town, the village, or country, no man can go even to the post-office and receive therefrom his county paper, where it has been deposited for him by its publisher, without paying postage thereon. This is certainly not equality before the law, if I may employ that phrase in this connection. For one, Mr. Speaker, representing a portion of the people, from whom have been taken this small privilege, I protest against the injustice and wrong. I do not ask that the free-delivery service be abolished in the cities, but appeal especially to the sense of justice of gentlemen representing the great cities, whose privileges I would not abridge, to come unitedly to the support of this bill.

The privileges granted by this bill, Mr. Speaker, will be valued by the people, because of its convenience more than for the insignificant sum saved to them. And, in fact, I have been told by many postmasters that the trouble and labor of keeping the complicated accounts for these small sums for county papers exceed the amount received in most cases.

The business and accounts of the Post-Office Department were immensely diminished and simplified by the use of stamps for letters, and while relieved of the annoying accounts for weekly county papers the labors were less and the postmaster's salary lessened.

One other consideration, Mr. Speaker, is not without weight.

It has become a settled policy for years to diffuse knowledge among the people at public expense. It is true that this is generally done by local authority, yet appropriations of the public lands and of money have frequently been made by the General Government to promote and diffuse knowledge. And the Government always has been, and ever should be, ready to lend its encouragement in that direction, especially where so much can be done for so small a service. To a greater or lesser degree the press is the medium through which information and knowledge pass to the people.

Say what we will, and denounce newspapers as we may and sometimes do, yet we all go to them for information. The people of all classes and conditions and stations in life consult them habitually, and cannot do without them, and their teachings are a part of the family education.

Some matters that are mischievous find their way into the press, yet much that is good, instructive, and elevating therein abounds; hence the circulation, and especially the local or domestic press, should have every avenue opened for its easy, cheap, and convenient distribution among the people.

I will not now further consume the time of the House by stating other reasons that occur to me why this bill ought to pass. I trust that the justice of its provisions will alone be sufficient to secure it sufficient support. Let us impartially weigh out the national privileges with an even balance to all the people.

Mr. BUNDY. At this late hour I do not know whether it is proper for me to go on now. I have no written speech, and no preparation for a speech, and I would willingly yield for a motion to adjourn, if I could be sure of obtaining the floor next Saturday.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will yield I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KELLEY. If we adjourn with the gentleman from Ohio on the floor, he will be entitled to the floor the next time we meet for the purpose of debate.

Mr. BUNDY. I will yield, then, as it is now ten minutes past four o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 19, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

Hon. JOHN P. JONES, of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWNLOW presented the petition of J. A. Anderson and others, of Bristol, Tennessee, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS. I received by mail this morning the petition of John Grable and other citizens of Doniphan County, Kansas, representing that the greatest evil which afflicts the prosperity of the country at the present time is the unjustly legalized monopoly of our fictitious system of public credit in banking and currency, and praying for the enactment of a law to provide for a currency to be based upon real estate secured by mortgage, four dollars base for one in circulation, which will need no redemption but to pay the interest and refund the money. I move that this petition be received and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Thomas Day, of Ripley County, Indiana, praying compensation for injuries sustained in consequence of the use of his nursery grounds by the United States military authorities in 1863 and 1864 for barracks and hospitals, and the destruction of his trees and plants; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of Thomas B. Wallace, praying compensation for property destroyed by the Army under orders from a military commander during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of J. N. Bryson and others, praying the establishment of a post-route from Cashier's Valley, Jackson County, North Carolina, to Walhalla, Oconee County, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of James R. Young, a citizen of New Hampshire, and late postmaster at Lisbon, praying to be reimbursed for loss sustained in the year 1869, by reason of his office being broken open and robbed of postage-stamps to the amount of $309.84; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition signed by Hon. Asa D. Smith, president of Dartmouth College, and many other citizens of New Hampshire, praying that a system of instruction in nautical science may be established on board of vessels of war; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of a large number of citizens of the city of Dover, New Hampshire, remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the bankrupt act; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter of the Surgeon-General of the United States Navy, suggesting larger appropriations in support of the Medical Department of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of J. B. Pierce and other citizens of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania; the petition of the Presbytery of Allegheny, Pennsylvania, M. H. Gill, moderator; the petition of the congregation of the Providence Presbyterian church, Allegheny City, Pennsylvania, Rev. William M. Robinson, pastor; the petition of the North Presbyterian church, of Allegheny City, Pennsylvania, representing over 200 communicants, Rev. A. A. Hodge, pastor; the petition of the Sandusky Street Baptist church, representing over 400 communicants, Rev. B. F. Woodburn, pastor; and the petition of the First United Presbyterian congregation, representing a membership of 450 persons, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOREMAN presented the memorial of Charles S. Bell, late of Galesburgh, Illinois, asking compensation for valuable and extraordinary services rendered by him to the United States during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of D. T. Wright and others, praying the establishment of a post-route in the counties of Tyler, Wetzel, and Marion, West Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Marshall County, West Virginia, praying that a pension may be allowed to William C. Parker, of that place; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURMAN. I present the petition of certain Winnebago Indians of the State of Wisconsin and other persons, setting forth what they allege to have been violations of the law and great injury to these Winnebagoes. The petition goes back a long way in the history of the Winnebagoes in Wisconsin. I will not trouble the Senate by asking it to listen to the early grievances recited in this paper, but I ask leave to read a passage which will show what are their immediate grievances:

> And your petitioners further represent that certain parties whose names are unknown to your petitioners have, by falsely representing that the Winnebagoes of Wisconsin were vagabonds, and that the people of Wisconsin were dissatisfied with their presence in Wisconsin, obtained appropriations from Congress for their removal, and by falsely representing that the Winnebagoes would be murdered by the people of Wisconsin unless they were removed from the State, the Government has been induced to issue orders to remove said Winnebagoes by force, if force should be found necessary; and a large portion of said Winnebagoes have been kidnapped and forcibly removed out of the State; and your petitioners of Indian blood and some of their white friends have been threatened, and are still threatened with like treatment; and your petitioners aver that such removal is contrary to the bill of rights and to the Constitution and laws of the United States and the State of Wisconsin, and contrary to the wishes of a greater portion of the people of Wisconsin. And your petitioners, in behalf of the whole Winnebago people, represent on information and belief that the moneys so appropriated have been squandered in employing worthless persons to threaten and persecute the Winnebagoes, and that the moneys due to the said Winnebagoes under the treaties are not, and have not for years past, been distributed as provided therein, or as right and justice demand, and that the said Winnebagoes have been, and are being, unlawfully, wrongfully, and cruelly deprived of their lives, liberty, and property, all of which they are ready to verify; and they firmly believe that the present persecution of the Winnebagoes of Wisconsin arises solely from political corruption.
> And your petitioners further aver that they have not presented the various wrongs complained of in detail, or cases of individual injustice, but stand ready to do so when opportunity shall be allowed; and your petitioners pray that a law may be passed by which they may become citizens, that they may enjoy their lives, liberties, and property as other citizens.

Attached to this petition are divers affidavits; and if they state what is the truth, a case is presented of flagrant violation of the law, and flagrant wrong; and I cannot too strongly ask the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs—to whom I propose that this petition shall be referred—to this petition, and the proof that accompanies it. I beg leave to read briefly from one of these affidavits.

The affiants swear:

> That on the 20th day of December, 1873, at the town of Caledonia, in the county of Columbia and State of Wisconsin, eighty-five of their relatives and friends were surrounded with men armed with bayonets and taken prisoners; that Big Hawk, one of their leading men, was handcuffed, and they were forcibly driven off, and were not allowed to take their baggage; and that a large portion of the baggage of said persons was stolen and destroyed; and they beg that restitution of the liberties of their relatives and friends and their property be given; that they have sought protection from the local authorities, but have been unable to obtain the same, or any promise for the future, for the reason that the act complained of has been and is being done under color of the authority of the United States Government, and that each of these affiants has been and still is threatened with forcible removal out of the State of Wisconsin; that the three persons first above named are land-owners; that the son of Whitewater was kidnapped while chopping cord-wood under contract.

Attached to this is an article from the Evening Wisconsin, which relates a case—I do not know how true it may be—that I will read:

> A delegation of one hundred and fifteen Winnebago Indians from Wisconsin passed through Saint Paul last Friday, en route for their new homes beyond the Missouri River. A case of hardship is mentioned in this connection—that of an Indian about forty-five years of age, quite intelligent, and observing all the outward forms of American civilization. He was the possessor of one hundred and sixty acres of land in his own name, on which he had erected a frame house with nine rooms. The soldiers found him in the woods on his own land, with his own team, getting out firewood. Without a word of explanation he was taken up by the soldiers and lugged off to the rendezvous, not being permitted to see or even notify his family of his misfortune, and next morning with others he was started for the Missouri. So strict were the orders of the guards that he was not allowed to go from one car to another to see if by chance his family were sharing his forced expulsion from his home, and when the train left Saint Paul he was still in ignorance of their fate.

I have only to say in presenting this petition that the law passed by Congress, to which I was very much opposed, authorized no exertion of force to drive these men from Wisconsin; but, on the contrary, the Senator from Wisconsin who sits on my right, [Mr. HOWE,] and who advocated the amendment, declared in that debate, if I recollect aright, that it was not the intention to employ force at all, but that this money was only to be expended in the removal of such of these Indians as were willing to go. I said then, and on the facts stated in this petition and verified I affirm again to-day, that these men, under the fourteenth article of amendments, are citizens of the United States, and that there is no right to remove them by force from Wisconsin.

These facts are verified. It was declared in that debate that there was no intention to use force, whether they were citizens or whether they were not; but force has been used; they have been kidnapped and carried away from their homes against their will, if these affidavits and this petition, which are sworn to, be true. I move the reference of the petition and accompanying papers to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SCHURZ, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Karl Mook in relation to the payment of arrears of pension to the heir of August Kessler be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Claude H. Masten be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 327) for the relief of George W. Lawrence; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 328) for the relief of the Portland Company, of Portland, Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 329) for the relief of Larrabee & Allen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 332) granting to the American Fork Railway Company a right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Alexander Campbell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORDON. I ask leave, without previous notice, to introduce a bill to relieve from political disabilities William L. Cabell, of Texas; and if there is no objection, I should be glad to have it considered immediately, as Mr. Cabell desires to run for mayor in his town. I have just received a letter from him, and he wishes to know whether his disabilities will be removed before he accepts the nomination. I will state that I think there is no objection whatever to the removal of his disabilities; and I ask for unanimous consent that there be immediate action upon the bill.

The bill (S. No. 334) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GORDON. I should like the Senate to act immediately. It has been done in one or two other instances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of the bill introduced by him. Is there objection?

Mr. WRIGHT. This bill has not been referred, I believe. I am willing to give way to the morning business, but not to the consideration of a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 335) for the relief of the Chickasaw Indians; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 336) to appoint a commission on the subject of the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. I introduce the bill by request, not intending to commit myself for or against it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 337) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Detroit River at the city of Detroit; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 338) to incorporate the Colorado Canal Irrigation and Land Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill is in pursuance of a recommendation contained in the last message of the President. I move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 339) to authorize the Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company to construct a branch line from Sibley, in the State of Iowa, to Yankton, in the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 340) granting a pension to George Baxter, only heir and minor child of Robert Baxter, late surgeon Tenth Regiment Minnesota Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CLAIMS OF MISSOURI.

Mr. BOGY. I ask leave to introduce a bill without previous notice. With the permission of the Senate I beg to say a few words to explain the object of this bill. It is a bill to reimburse the State of Missouri a balance yet due that State for expenditures of public money in equipping troops during the late war.

The State of Missouri, from its geographical position, became and was during the late war a battle-ground to a greater or less extent, and the internal conflicts compelled her to suffer greater losses and endure greater expenses than any other State that remained loyal to the Union.

While she was thus torn, distracted, and pillaged by contending armies, she fulfilled all her duties to the Union; the military resources of the State were taxed to the utmost extent, and at times and in some sections every male capable of doing service was compelled to bear arms. Every one will recall how the loyal people rallied around the national standard, even before the President made his first call for troops. Their patriotism did not swerve in the darkest days, and as call after call was made by the General Government, her response was no less prompt and willing. Under those calls Missouri furnished, up to April 30, 1865, no less than 110,000 troops. The expense of raising these troops was borne by the General Government and by the State.

Besides this number of troops the State raised, during the war, eighty-nine regiments, four battalions, and three companies of enrolled militia, and fifty-six companies of provisional militia, all of which did an active service—some of them for a year at a time—extending from 1861 till after the close of actual hostilities. These troops were called into service at the request and suggestions and by the orders of the General Government, and by the orders of the generals commanding the department. They did excellent service in the field. Many were killed, wounded, and died of disease. These troops took the place of the same number of regulars or volunteers that would have been kept within the State but for the presence of these militia forces. The services of these troops have since been recognized to the extent that Congress has put them on the same footing as other soldiers as to pensions by the act of March 3, 1873, "An act relating to pensions," &c. These troops were raised entirely at the expense of the State, who clothed, armed, equipped, subsisted, paid, and mounted them. All these expenses, which in other States—excepting Kentucky, and there not entirely—were borne by the General Government, were borne alone and entirely by the State of Missouri. At the close of the war the State asked a reimbursement of what she had paid on account of these troops, and Congress, without an objection, recognized the justice of the claim and passed the act of April 17, 1866, entitled "An act to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion."

Under this act the State was repaid that portion of the expense that had been paid by the State up to the time the account or statement was made to Congress, namely, to the summer of 1865. At this time, however, all the expenses had not been paid by the State. In many cases several companies out of a regiment had not been paid; many men out of a company had remained unpaid; many bills had not been presented for payment, it being at the immediate close of the war. And the State not having at that time paid or assumed these expenses, they not having been presented, were not, as a matter of course, included in the demand made in 1865 upon the General Government, nor were they provided for under the provisions of the act of April 17, 1866. They are precisely of a similar character, however, being expenses incurred for the same troops and at the same periods.

Upon presenting a portion of these latter claims to the Treasury Department for reimbursement the State was informed that though the expenses were similar in their nature to those paid under the act of 1866, and appeared to be equally just and proper expenses as those provided for by said act, yet as the commission provided for by said act had expired, and the appropriation made by the act had not been drawn upon for the space of two years, it had lapsed into the Treasury, and, consequently, legislation of Congress would be necessary. The amount remaining unexpended is about $170,000. Had these claims been paid by the State at the time of the passage of the act of 1866 they would have been included at that time; but like all other States, many and large bills were not presented or paid till after the close of the war. As it is with the General Government, which is now paying millions annually for war expenses incurred years ago, so it is with Missouri, who now asks reimbursement for the remainder of the expense she incurred for the direct benefit of the General Government, the greater portion having been reimbursed under the act of 1866.

Kentucky made a similar claim upon the Treasury for the services and expenses of troops of precisely a like character, and Congress, by the act of June 8, 1872, provided for the reimbursement of Kentucky for this same class of expense; and in order to be placed upon the same footing as the State of Kentucky, the bill presented is drawn upon the same principle and wording as that bill.

The object is to extend the meaning and provisions of the act already once passed for the benefit of Missouri, to include those expenses of like nature and incurred for the same service but unpaid at that time, and to now provide for their payment.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 330) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, and paying militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 331) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to detain the Senate with any extended remarks in reference to the measure just submitted; and knowing as I do the imperative demands now being made upon the time and attention of Congress by the financial and other great national questions of the hour, I beg pardon for trespassing upon that time and attention even for a few minutes; but as the title of the bill reported by me might lead to a misconception of the real nature and character of the measure proposed, I deem it but just and proper, before moving its reference to the appropriate committee, to submit a few words in explanation of its objects and probable effects.

I am not a silent listener, Mr. President, nor am I one of those who would turn a deaf ear to that unmistakable and imperative voice of the people of the whole country which to-day demands economy and retrenchment in the public service; nor to that equally impressive voice that demands of the national Congress such legislation as may operate to provide suitable transportation to those who are without it, and to cheapen it where extortion now prevails, and thus neutralize to some extent the unwarrantable exercise of questionable powers by corporations over the rights of the people; and it is in obedience to these two great demands of the country, and in the real interests of the Government and the people, that I submit the measure now under consideration; and although this bill is substantially the creation of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad Company, and as it now stands receives, as I am informed, the approval of the president of the company, Colonel W. W. Chapman, whose untiring efforts in advocating the interests of this enterprise deserve commendation, it affords me pleasure to be able to state, that the measure is one in the true interest of commerce, public economy, and retrenchment, and has received, as I believe, the almost universal indorsement of the people, without regard to politics, of the State of Oregon, and of Idaho and Washington Territories, and the whole North Pacific coast, that are to be affected by its adoption. Therefore, so far from this being a case where a railroad company is knocking at the doors of Congress and demanding national aid, while the people who are to be affected by the measure are indignant and remonstrating against it as one calculated to confer special powers and privileges upon a corporation that would operate as a means of aggrandizement to the few and an instrument of oppression to the many, the very reverse is the fact; and from Portland, Oregon, to the great basin of Salt Lake, on the line of the Central Pacific, all along the proposed route, the people en masse are holding meetings, and demanding, in the name not only of their immediate commercial interests, but also in behalf of economy, retrenchment, and cheap transportation, the adoption of this measure.

The question presented is not the old one, so much and so rightfully, perhaps, criticised, and objected to, and denounced by the whole country, namely, that of indiscriminate and gratuitous aid upon the part of the General Government in the construction of lines of railways in which the company gets everything and the Government nothing—not by any means. The proposition bears no kin or similarity, either in form or substance, to any of the measures heretofore adopted by companies in aid of the construction of railroads by the grant of public lands, guarantee of interest, bonds, &c., and which have as a rule invoked the opposition to a very great extent of the people and of the two great political parties of the nation; but, on the contrary, this bill, if adopted, would not only result in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line between the head of ship navigation at Portland, Oregon, the waters of the Columbia, and the great transcontinental line of the Union and Central Pacific roads, thus speedily removing the only remaining obstruction in that internal highway along which the immense commerce of China, and Japan, and the islands of the Pacific will eventually move, but will result in an absolute saving to the Government each year, by reason of the free carriage, proposed by the bill, of the United States mails and all Government property and supplies, to say nothing of the vast area of country to be opened up to settlement, stretching, as it does, nearly half across our continent, and the general development of the industries of our common country. These are questions susceptible of actual demonstration.

I have in these remarks referred to the saving to the Government by the passage of this bill in its actual annual expenditures for the public service, without any reference to other matters.

The Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad Company was organized nearly four years ago under the general incorporation laws of the State of Oregon, for the purpose of constructing a railroad and telegraph line from Portland, Oregon, to the line of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads, at or near Salt Lake, in Utah Territory, with a short branch from a suitable point west of the Blue Mountains to Walla Walla. It was organized originally, not by speculators or railroad adventurers, but by and in the interest of the people along its line; and I am glad to be able to state that this management has continued until the present time. It has received words of encouragement and positive and emphatic sanction from political conventions of both political parties, from State and territorial Legislatures, individual advocates, and a united press, all along the line, from its inception to the present time.

In addition to all this, April 12, 1872, the Congress of the United States gave recognition to this enterprise by passing an act granting to this company a right of way through the public domain for the construction of a railroad from Great Salt Lake to Portland, Oregon. Again, March 3, 1873, Congress passed a second act, granting to the company the right to take from the public lands of the United States timber, stone, and other materials necessary for the construction of its road. In October, 1872, the Legislature of the State of Oregon passed an act granting the proceeds of the sales of the State swamp lands, less some appropriations previously made, together with the 5 per cent. fund arising from the sales of public lands, in aid of the construction of this road, and also memorialized Congress at the same session for congressional aid to the enterprise. In pursuance, then, of the general sentiment of the people, of the expression of State and territorial Legislatures, of conventions of both political parties, and of the desire of the company, all acting, as I believe, in accord and in what I conceive also to be the true interest of the Government with reference to the important questions of economy and retrenchment in the public service, and in what I know to be the true interest of an isolated and pioneer people, scattered as they are along the rivers, all over the valleys, and on the mountain sides of as rich a country as ever met the eyes of man, and who are to-day suffering not merely for the want of cheap transportation, as is the case with many of the people of the Western States east of the Missouri River, but from the absolute absence of all means of transportation, I submit this bill to the impartial and candid consideration of the Senate.

It provides, in brief, that the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad, as I have already designated it, shall be a military and post road, and that said road, or the company controlling or operating it, shall, for all time, transport over the same the United States mail, all Army and Indian supplies, and perform all other Government service usual for railroads to perform, including the transmission of all Government dispatches upon such telegraph line, free of any charge, compensation, or reward. It further provides that said road shall be of the narrow gauge; that the work shall be commenced on the division between the Columbia River and the eastern terminus, a distance of about five hundred miles, within six months from the approval of the act, and completed for that distance within three years; that the division between Portland and the intersection of the eastern division with the Columbia River shall be commenced within six months from the passage of the act; that the portions around the Cascades and the Dalles of the Columbia shall be first completed, and that the western division of about two hundred miles, between Portland and the intersection on the Columbia River, shall be completed in two years from the passage of the act.

The bill has a provision that strikes at the abuses so prevalent among railroad companies of the present day, and which has as much as any other one cause aided in producing the present opposition to these corporations; and that is an unjust and oppressive discrimination in freight and passenger charges, both as to persons and sections. It provides that the company shall not use any means that shall discriminate in freight and passenger charges in favor of or against any person or corporation shipping or passing over said road, nor for or against any particular town or place on the line of such road; and that all charges for freight or passage over the same between regular stations shall be pro rata with the usual charges for like service over the whole line. This is a protection to the people, and is, I insist, a proposition that Congress may constitutionally and rightfully submit to any company, and which, if accepted by such company, will have the binding force of law that cannot be successfully questioned either by rival companies or individuals, as it does not, in my judgment, touch the mooted question as to the right or power or policy of the General Government to regulate or control freight and passenger charges on railroads. That is another and quite a different proposition, in reference to which, at present, I do not propose to intimate any opinion, much less discuss it. When that question comes up it will be time enough to meet it.

The bill further provides that the company may issue its bonds to the extent of $10,000 per mile and no more, and in denominations of $1,000 each, running twenty years, payable in United States gold coin, to aid in the construction of its road and telegraph line, such bonds to bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, in like gold coin; and to secure the payment of such bonds to mortgage its road, rolling-stock, property, and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions; that interest coupons shall be attached, signed by the treasurer of the company, and whenever and as often as such company shall complete twenty or more consecutive miles, or, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, a less number, and the same shall have been examined and accepted at the expense of the company, by commissioners appointed by the Government, and that fact shall be certified to the Treasurer of the United States by the Secretary of the Interior, such Treasurer, upon the presentation of such company's first-mortgage bonds to the extent of $10,000 per mile of such completed portions, shall countersign the interest coupons thereto attached and deliver the bonds and coupons attached to such bonds, and thereupon such coupons shall be due and payable at the Treasury of the United States according to their tenor and effect.

It is further provided that the company shall annually report a condensed statement showing its net earnings, and that 25 per cent. of these shall, at the end of the year, be invested in United States interest-bearing bonds, and shall constitute a sinking fund with which to purchase or redeem at maturity the principal of the said first-mortgage bonds.

These are the substantial features of the measure; and it may now be asked, inasmuch as it proposes that the Government shall assume the payment of this interest to the extent indicated, where does your idea of economy or retrenchment come in? How is the Government to be compensated for this annual expenditure? What are the credit and debit sides of your account between the Government and the company; and what are your balances at the end of the year; and in what manner is the Government affected in the interest of reform in reference to the public expenditures; and what are the national benefits in a commercial point of view that are to result from this enterprise? To these inquiries I would attract the attention of the Senate.

The distance from the probable point of intersection on the line of the Central Pacific, say Kelton, to the Columbia River, is about five hundred miles; $10,000 per mile for this distance would be $5,000,000. The interest upon this amount at 5 per cent. per year would be $250,000. This, then, is what is demanded of the General Government by this bill in aid of the construction of a railroad and telegraph line that will connect the waters of the Columbia with the great central artery of the nation that to-day spans the continent, and for which it secures to the Government for all time the free transmission, not only of the United States mails—by which the whole North Pacific coast is to be supplied with postal facilities—but also of all Government supplies, military, Indian, or otherwise, to say nothing of the annihilation of time by the substitution of railroad speed for that of the stage-coaches.

Now what is the Government doing to-day in reference to this service? A mail-route exists over this same route, or almost identical with it, from Kelton on the line of the Central Pacific Railroad to the Dalles on the Columbia River. The mail over this route is carried by contract with the Government on four-horse stage-coaches; and for this service alone the Post-Office Department is to-day paying the enormous sum annually of $224,000, a sum in itself almost equal to the whole amount of interest required for the construction of the proposed railroad and telegraph line over this distance. From the Dalles to Portland, Oregon, the Department is paying the further sum annually of $18,000 for mail service alone, making an annual expenditure for the transmission of the United State mails from Kelton to Portland, Oregon, of $242,000. But this is not all. Another mail-route exists to-day from Winnemucca, State of Nevada, to Boise City, Idaho Territory, on which there is daily mail service, for which the Government is paying the annual sum of $72,000. Other mail-routes exist, all of them to-day absolutely necessary to supply the wants of the people, but the service on which, to a very great extent, would be supplied by a construction of this road.

Again, the time occupied in carrying a letter from Kelton, on the line of the Central Pacific, to Portland, Oregon, is about eight days, while with a railroad this time would be reduced to about thirty hours. If then, Mr. President, I were to stop here I have said enough, it seems to me, to remove every possible objection to this bill, so far as any question is concerned as to the mere policy of the Government aiding the enterprise to the extent required, considered in an economical point of view. But this is not all, only a mere tithe of the benefits that must necessarily result to the Government from the construction of this road upon the terms and conditions proposed in this bill. What does the Government, the Indian Department and the War Department, disburse annually, I would inquire, in the transportation of its troops, freight, and supplies which are conveyed every year to the North Pacific coast, to Oregon, Idaho, Washington Territory, Montana, and Alaska? Contemplate but for a moment the vast extent of country lying northwest of the line of the Central Pacific Railroad, and which would be supplied through this arm of the great national trunk line of transcontinental communication—an area greater in extent than all of New England, with the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois added thereto. We have in the three political divisions of the State of Oregon and of Washington and Idaho Territories an area of two hundred and fifty-one thousand five hundred and sixty square miles, with all of Western Montana and part of Utah to the northwest, while Alaska, with five hundred and seventy thousand square miles more, lies still beyond to the northward.

This vast region—I refer now to Oregon and Idaho and Washington Territories—is dotted from one extreme to the other with Indian reservations and agencies and military posts; not so many military posts, however, as the necessities of our people demand. If we had a few more of these, with increased garrisons and a better supply of arms, I have no doubt it would be better for the general prosperity of our country; we would have fewer Indian outrages, and more ample protection to settlers. But as the matter now stands, the annual expenditures by the Government, especially by the Indian and War Departments, in supplying these various agencies and military posts cannot be otherwise than immense. And in addition to all this, there is the branch of our revenue marine and engineer service on the North Pacific coast constantly demanding shipments from the Eastern States in maintaining and developing our commerce. Connect the great national highway, connecting the central artery of the nation with the waters of the grandest river on the globe, interlacing its arms, as it does, with those of the Missouri and Saskatchewan in the remote regions of perpetual snow, thus holding communion with the two grand valleys of the continent, and you prepare a free highway for the nation that will save to this Government annually, in the transmission of mails and Government shipments and in the transportation of Government troops, not merely hundreds of thousands, but, at no distant day, millions of dollars. And all these advantages are to be secured to the Government, a right and a privilege exclusive and perpetual in its character, for the mere pittance of $350,000 annually for a period of twenty years. When I say "mere pittance" I speak, of course, in a comparative sense. It is indeed a considerable sum; but when considered with reference to the fact that $316,000 are now paid annually for the single item of mail carriage over the route, that would be supplied free of all charge by the construction of this road, and the further fact of the vast sums that are annually disbursed for other Government services in this direction, and all of which would be obviated by this enterprise, the expenditure asked by this bill becomes insignificant in amount; and when viewed in the light of the still broader intelligence that is capable of grasping the grand results of this national enterprise, and that must unquestionably be exhibited in the commercial prosperity of the whole country, it seems to me there should be no hesitation in giving support to this measure.

We of the North Pacific coast have watched and waited with a modesty that defies criticism and a patience that challenges the production of a parallel for some successful effort upon the part of the General Government that will wrest us from our isolation and place our people on some kind of an equality, in a commercial point of view, with other sections of the country, by means of railroad communication. The cry is coming up to the ears of the Republic to-day from the great valleys of the Mississippi, and from the States of the South, "Give us cheap transportation," and, although these States are checkered with railroads, I doubt not the justice of their demands; but the appeal that comes from an isolated, pioneer, and waiting people of the North Pacific coast is of a somewhat different character. It is, "Give us one railroad, one means of communication with the balance of mankind, one connecting link that may bind us commercially and socially with the busy millions who dwell in the older and more finished portions of our common country that lie east of the Rocky Mountains." The hardy sons of toil who to-day are scattered over the State of Oregon and Idaho and Washington Territories say, through their representatives in Congress, "We have braved and suffered all the trials, the hardships, and the dangers of frontier life, and have, upon these distant shores, laid the foundations of an empire of civilization, of commercial greatness, and political influence and power, and now we appeal to a just and discriminating Government to aid us, by its willing heart and strong hand, to join together in the manner indicated by this bill the two empires of power and the two commercial extremes of the East and the West." In other words, more direct and plain, and free from all unnecessary verbiage, we want, and must have, railroad communication with the Eastern States.

There was a time when our people looked forward with much hope to the completion of the North Pacific road, but unfortunately it has encountered embarrassments. Just how far these may impede its progress I am not advised. It is to be hoped, however, that all these difficulties may be overcome, and the road be built. All our people would rejoice at such a consummation; but I know the enterprise is a gigantic one, and must necessarily involve a vast expenditure of money. Over fourteen hundred miles of broad-gauge road must yet be constructed to reach the waters of the Columbia. The whole cost will not fall far short, probably, of half a hundred millions of dollars; and while I hope for success, I confess to a fear as to the result. Our people desire its completion; the interests of commerce, of trade, and every consideration of national importance join in expression as to its necessity as a great national highway. Whether a work so vast can in these critical financial times be successfully prosecuted is of course a problem for its managers to solve.

But the construction of the North Pacific would be no argument against the road proposed by this bill, as it, with the exception of a portion of the distance down the Columbia River, traverses an entirely different country and affects entirely different interests. The Cascades and the Dalles of the Columbia River, the one four, the other fourteen miles in length, are obstructions to our commerce that virtually separate the waters and the ship-channel of the lower Columbia from the great grain-fields of Eastern Oregon and Washington Territory. The valleys of Walla Walla, Grand Ronde, Umatilla, Burnt River, and Powder River, constituting an area larger than the whole State of Pennsylvania, and the finest wheat countries in the world, are wholly without any means of transportation for their immense surplus products. When wheat is selling at Portland, Oregon, at $1.25 per bushel, it will bring but thirty and forty cents in Eastern Oregon and Washington Territory. To ship wheat from Walla Walla to Portland, a distance of a little over two hundred miles, it must be handled thirteen times in getting it from warehouse to boat, from boat to car, and car to boat, and so on. The producer in this fertile valley pays ten dollars per ton, thirty cents per bushel, to get this wheat from his barn to the river, a distance of thirty miles. At Wallula, on the Columbia River, he pays five cents per bushel warehouse charges, and from there to Portland, on the regular boats of the Columbia River, he pays eighteen cents more per bushel, the boats making two regular trips only per week; on special boats twenty-four cents per bushel.

I simply refer to this to show the utter helplessness of the people of this large extent of country, surrounded by mountains on the one hand and a desert on the other, with no possible means of escape, except down a river where natural obstructions and the monopoly of transportation necessarily resulting therefrom, constitute a still more formidable barrier than either mountain or desert.

One great overshadowing purpose of this measure is to annihilate this state of things, to overcome these natural obstructions, by the construction of a railroad around them, thus at one and the same time striking down the force of the obstructions and the power of the monopoly of transportation they inspire; and these portages, it is provided in the bill, shall be first completed, so that competition on the great river of the West shall no longer be held in abeyance, so that the key to this national thoroughfare shall no longer be held by the few, but be free to all.

The enterprise suggested in this bill is not one of a merely local nature, which if consummated would result in a benefit to a small section of country or to but a few people; it is national in its character and objects. It is no less a proposition than to unite in close connection, through the means of railway communication, the Pacific Northwest with the great internal arteries of commerce on the eastern side of the Rocky Mountains, and that, too, by the nearest possible route, about seven hundred miles, connecting the waters of the Columbia and the Central Pacific by a line five hundred miles in length, and this, too, over a track marked by nature in the geographical and topographical formation of the country as one of the many great channels of trade that serve to make our country commercially rich and powerful.

There is a trade, Mr. President, that lurks along the shores of China and Japan, and of those of the Hawaiian group and other islands of the Pacific that the ships of commerce have already envied. England has long enjoyed it, and she will not surrender it without a struggle. That trade of right belongs to America and not to England. How are we to secure it? Simply by connecting our transcontinental highway by means of railroad communication, aided by the free navigation of the waters of the Columbia, with the head of ship navigation on this river. It is a fact patent it seems to me to all that the commerce of Asia, from Behring's Straits to those of Malacca, comprising most of Farther India, all of China and Japan, and the eastern empire of the Russias, together with the islands of the North Pacific, must eventually and at no distant day find its natural and geographical center in the waters of the Columbia River.

These harbors are on an almost direct line between the coasting ports of China and those of Chicago and New York, while San Francisco is far out of range to the southward. From New York to Shanghai via Chicago, San Francisco, and the midway islands, it is 10,423 miles; while from New York to Shanghai, via Chicago, over the route proposed in this bill and by the Columbia River is only about 8,800 miles, making a difference in the distance of the two routes of over sixteen hundred miles. In these days—when it has come to be considered an axiom in commercial science that the nearer we approach to the annihilation of time and space in the transit of merchandise, and the more rapid the succession of sales, transfers, and supplies, the nearer we come to perfection in the laws of trade—it occurs to me the consideration just suggested should be entitled to some weight, as an argument in favor of the speedy completion of the enterprise in aid of which this bill is submitted by me to the impartial consideration of the Committee on Railroads, to which I now move its reference.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 352) for the relief of Colonel E. McCarty;

A bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan;

A bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa;

A bill (H. R. No. 1226) granting a pension to Francis Bernard;

A bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham;

A bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell;

A bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William J. Denniston, late an acting lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1221) to confirm certain land titles in the State of Missouri;

A bill (H. R. No. 1228) granting a pension to Mary Storrs;

A bill (H. R. No. 1229) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. McCracken, widow of Robert McCracken, acting assistant surgeon United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, deceased.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 352) for the relief of Colonel E. McCarty—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa—to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 1226) granting a pension to Francis Bernard—to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham—to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William J. Denniston, late an acting lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 1221) to confirm certain land titles in the State of Missouri—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 1228) granting a pension to Mary Storrs—to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 1229) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. McCracken, widow of Robert McCracken, acting assistant surgeon United States Army—to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, deceased—to the Committee on Pensions.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the last day's session, which is the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, upon which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, if any one, through you, shall ask me to give way during the short time I occupy the floor, I authorize you to say that "the Senator from Iowa declines to yield." I do this not because I flatter myself that I shall say anything of sufficient interest to lead any one to desire to interrupt me, nor yet because I would admit now that I cannot give an answer to any fair inquiry, but because I wish at this time, in the most humble and yet decided manner, to enter my protest against a practice daily becoming more common in this Senate. As I read the earlier debates, interruptions were exceedingly rare. This ought to be so now. The debates here, I may be allowed to say, are gradually degenerating into a mere running artillery of words. This high body is becoming, I submit, a grand polemic school, where each one seems to be anxious to have the last word or to give the best response; and thus, as I think, the proprieties of debate and the dignities of the place are certainly but gradually degenerating. I therefore have served this notice; and if those around me, much more able to lead, shall apply the corrective, I shall certainly be ready to follow. Than this, in my judgment, for reasons which time will not allow me to mention, few things as affecting the business of the Senate are more important. And now, Mr. President, having said this much, I come to the subject before the Senate.

In the years long gone a waggish attorney in one of our Western States, addressing the court, when referring to the counsel prosecuting the "pleas and plaints" of the Government, frequently spoke of him as the "learned district attorney;" which, creating a smile from bench and bar, the speaker continued, "Why, your honor, he is learned; he is bound to be so; for the statute declares that the President shall, from time to time, appoint a person learned in the law to the position; and he is therefore made learned by law."

The difference between myself and the official referred to is that he was a good lawyer, and I am not sure that I know anything upon the subject before the Senate. And yet the incident is applicable, inasmuch as I am a member of the committee reporting this resolution, and hence I suppose must know something about finance. This is certainly the presumption. It may be a most violent one, resting alone upon the legal and not the fact rule; but still it obtains, and I must accept the situation as best I can. Doubtless, before I conclude, this presumption will be abundantly rebutted in the estimation of at least some of my friends, and I can obtain leave to retire from the discussion without chaplet or laurel.

I have listened very attentively to much of this most interesting debate, now consuming some two weeks. And I have thus listened because I sought instruction and wanted light. And yet I confess I have been not a little embarrassed as well as amused. With due deference, I must admit that words have only tended to darken counsel. Of course it is my fault, and I have no hope that I shall now be more successful. The real struggle seems to be, whether we shall by law provide for an actual or conditional return to specie payments. One side is said to favor contraction, the other expansion; and yet neither will admit the soft impeachment. The distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from Ohio, with all his earnestness for maintaining what he calls the plighted faith of the Government, is equally earnest in his indignant denial that he is a contractionist. And yet he advocates a general policy which as inevitably leads to contraction, in my judgment, as any necessary effect will follow a cause. And so no man will admit that he is an expansionist. But if the mere addition to the currency is expansion, then it would seem that there are those who should be thus classed. But that which has interested me most is to see the wonderful agreement of our good friends who demand a return to specie payments, and their clear conception of just how and when it is to be brought about. Whether we shall pay gold next July or next January; whether we shall get it by selling bonds, or where is it to come from; whether if we start we can keep it up, and if so, how long; whether the recent monetary derangement was a panic, a crisis, a revolution, or an accident; whether it was attributable to our currency; to the "lies," the "frauds," the "engraved falsehoods," (as they style them) in the shape of greenbacks, or to something else; whether we shall pay gold and nothing else, or whether we shall, at the option of the Government, give out bonds—all these, and many other matters, they seem to leave quite undecided. And, indeed, the chairman of the committee, so furious for resumption, says, himself, that he ventures no opinion; does not commit himself to any theory, to any plan, and so he leaves it. And yet we are asked, in the midst of all this uncertainty—without any definite suggestion from him certainly—to enter upon this hazardous experiment, and this, too, with the most perfect indifference whether the balance of trade is for or against us, (for than this, in his opinion, there is no greater humbug,) and, too, though he admits that such payments cannot be maintained under all circumstances, a fact, as he says, not resting in theory merely, but attested by demonstrated experience. And thus the argument stands. And yet we are expected to vote for resumption, whatever the plan, however little our ability, whatever the consequences, because we are pledged to do so "as early as practicable." But I anticipate.

Mr. President, we have in these times any number of wise men upon this great question. They have studied the subject, and mastered, as is supposed, its many mysteries and difficulties—have a sure and only proper panacea, and call upon all to take them upon their shoulders with rejoicings, and usher in with timbrel and song their triumphal day. I have no doubt some of them are entitled to these high honors, and I confess, if I knew which, I would be willing to join, if not lead, the procession of grateful and enlightened followers. Until I do know, however, I trust I shall be excused for any seeming want of reverence or failure to worship at any self-erected shrine. I do not pretend to understand the disease, nor to have a cure; and, therefore, do not expect any disciples. My aim shall be to simply express my own views, though in a manner ever so crude, caring less that they agree with the so-called theories and principles of the learned ones in political economy than that they accord with some conceded rules of common sense, and the undisputed facts around us, which after all are of more value than all the speculations of the best and most astute theorizers of this or all the ages.

In the great Chicago conflagration, two friends standing together observed a very small light on the roof of the magnificent court-house of that burning city. One says, "That can do no harm, for the building is fire-proof." The other says, "That may be, but look, the fire is increasing rapidly." "I don't care for that," was the response; "it is fire-proof, and cannot burn." But it did burn to the ground.

I doubt not I am wanting in reverence or afflicted with doubts upon some matters. We all are. One of my many weaknesses is that if I find the fact one way and the theory, though ever so plausible and well stated, the other, I accept the fact and let the theory find other and, of course, better-informed worshipers. In this I am doubtless wrong; but I cannot help it. It is not my fault. If the court-house burns, I will not insist that fire cannot destroy it.

We have had what is called a financial crisis, or panic, or revulsion, (I care but little for names;) and, as always heretofore, everybody has looked about for the causes and then for the remedy. That is what we are engaged in now, trying to diagnose the disease, get at the producing causes, and then from an intelligent stand-point make the prescription. With one school of financial doctors there seems to be agreement, a wonderful degree of unanimity, if I except my excellent friends the Senators from Ohio and Vermont, [Messrs. SHERMAN and MORRILL,] who here unfortunately differ; but for the most part there is agreement in ascribing the patient's situation to an overdose of currency, greenbacks, paper money, the absence of gold, (the antidote;) and naturally enough the remedy in their estimation is gold in the place of greenbacks, coin in exchange for paper; that the patient shall have a solid, precious, world-convertible diet, a diet that has intrinsic value, and not the wishy-washy, easily-destroyed, worthless, airy, "lamp-black and rags" "stuff," which has well-nigh destroyed its life, and must make it a hopeless invalid for years if not for all time. The disciples of this school may be termed (I speak with due respect, I trust) either contractionists or substitutionists; for they would either deprive the sick one of a good portion of its pabulum, giving nothing of the same kind in return, or else they would throw away all now prescribed and replace it with something, as they believe, better, stronger, safer. I confess that I do not so understand the disease, and of course cannot approve the prescription.

Is the financial disturbance attributable to greenbacks, and would it have been avoided if we had reached or had been operating upon a metallic basis? I am a novice, I know, in these matters; but in my judgment our paper currency as such, and as contradistinguished from gold, had about as much to do with our monetary troubles as the "balancing-pole" of the acrobat, the "night-blooming cereus," or (if my friend from Vermont will allow a figure so homely in connection with his, so eminently classic and unique) a "last year's bird's nest."

Why, Mr. President, if we reflect upon what has taken place, and give a little attention to the times and our people, this financial disturbance is not so surprising. How could we expect anything else? We certainly could not, unless we expected different results from like causes than have been found all along the pathway of our business and financial life. For years we have been overtrading—the nation and individuals alike running into debt. Publicly and privately, as a nation and individuals, we have paid a rate of interest beyond that warranted by our increase in either wealth or population, and of which I shall possibly have more to say hereafter. Everywhere the nation has been afflicted by an excessive haste to get rich—a spirit of speculation, extravagance in living; a class of men occupying high places in the financial synagogue who were of bad personal habits and wanting in correct business talent—Mammon-worshipers—and no one contenting himself to take other than the Napoleonic seat in the marts of trade, stocks, and commerce. Need I tell you that a spirit has possessed us to live by our wits, leaving the mechanic arts, agriculture, and manual labor to those esteemed of coarser mold? For years we have cheated ourselves, and have either been unwilling or indisposed to look the real state of facts squarely in the face. This struggle for preferment and wealth has not been healthy and elevating, but a "steeple-chase, a headlong, maddening rush." The schemes of men for getting rich in a day have been endless. "It matters not in what such deal, whether in oroide watches or in watered stock; whether they make corners in wheat or gold; whether they gamble in oats or at roulette; whether they steal a railway or a man's money by gift concerts and lotteries, the principle is in all cases the same—striving to obtain something for nothing, to get value without parting with anything in exchange." And thus in the estimation of the schemers and the world vast fortunes are made, and often as suddenly lost; which has been thus briefly, but justly and scathingly epitomized:

> Monday I dabbled in stock operations;
> Tuesday, owned millions by all calculations;
> Wednesday my Fifth avenue palace began;
> Thursday I drove out a spanking bay span;
> Friday I gave a magnificent ball;
> And Saturday, "smashed," with nothing at all.

And so we have gone on—"like high-pressure Mississippi steamers, pitching rosin into the furnace to get along faster, and piling weights upon the safety-valves, until finally the boilers burst; hundreds are killed or crippled, and we are compelled to stop for awhile, until we get over the fright of the explosion. Pretty soon the repairs are made; the steam is up again; we are buoyant with confidence. 'Hope constantly smiles and waves her golden hair;' again we are 'going it' at a fearful pace, and in due time another crash comes. The warnings of the past are lost upon us; cautious men are voted old fogies, and their admonitions and advice clog on the wheels of enterprise." In a word, "Americans must be Americans, and blow up as a necessity of their existence."

Now, these are the facts. History is only repeating itself. We do these things year after year, and experience the blowing up and coming down process just about so often—every five, eight, or ten years. I state the fact and you agree with me. Do you tell me the furnace was fed with greenbacks; that this fuel made too much steam; and that if we had leisurely and sparingly shoveled in gold or coin, we would have kept under the fire and avoided the blow up? If so, answer me, why the fire got too hot, and why did the boiler burst in the years still remembered, when you had and used the golden fuel?

If this irredeemable paper money led us into these wild schemes, and men have been thereby induced to pay a rate of interest inevitably leading to disaster and revulsion, how will you explain why, when we had gold in circulation—and the banks were paying gold in 1857—was 20, 30, or 40 per cent. interest readily obtained, as was stated by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] a sum at least three times that now paid? And why, if gold is to restrain this ruinous interest, do we pay now a larger interest in California, where they have a metallic currency, than where we have legal-tenders and bank paper? Of course there is in theory an answer to all this. But the facts remain, and upon these I stand. Yes, sir; you talk about a "dishonored and irredeemable paper," and yet you had "honored and redeemable paper" in 1837 and 1857. Did this prevent these financial crises? If at the door of a paper currency not immediately convertible at par are laid all the ruin and consequences of the recent panic, why may I not with equal reason say the same thing—yea, an infinitely worse state of things—has happened more than once in our history when we redeemed in gold, and therefore gold is responsible for all such ills? There is as much logic in the one proposition as the other; but I do not think there is much, if any, in either. The cause is further back, as I have attempted to show. We have been going too fast; we have done so heretofore, and we will do so, probably, in the future, whatever the currency. Men will engage in these schemes of speculation if they can get credit and inspire the people with confidence in the dividends to come from their enterprises. For several years they have been sending up these kites, and they have seemed to float beautifully—these gas-bags in the shape of watered stocks, "South-Sea bubble" corporations; railways to the moon, to the land of the "Teton Sioux," the hunting grounds of the Mohaves, or the Alaskian home of the seal and the Esquimaux (I use these by way of illustration)—beautiful and apparently full bubbles, wafted and kept up on the market by the machinations of Wall street and the money of confiding stockholders. I say such as these were sent up, and were kept up, by every sort of financial legerdemain, until finally the best skill was exhausted, the bubbles vanished, the gas-bags collapsed. Then everybody lost confidence for awhile in everybody else. That was discovered which ought to have been known from the beginning, to wit, that the volume of currency sufficient for thirty or thirty-five millions of people would not answer the wants of forty-one millions, with their increased trade and commerce. And instantly the cry is, "What a pity we were not on a specie basis; what a shame our currency is dishonored; for with gold or a redeemable currency we could have kept afloat and avoided the terrible collapse."

Mr. President, does any one believe this? Perhaps we all should do so. I do not know but that it is my duty to so believe; but I cannot, and I hope I shall be excused. Do you believe it?

O, no; this won't do, this claim that our "legal-tenders" are dishonored, and therefore the cause of our troubles. Look at the grand history of this nation for the last twelve years. See what we have accomplished. Was ever a nation so tried? Take the drain upon our resources, the loss of life and treasure. Look at us as we were when treason seized the flag and sought to trail it in the dust; without navy or army; an empty Treasury; arms there were none; a defiant army threatening the very doors of this Capitol; "treason before, behind, all around us like the atmosphere;" and see an army of millions organized; fleets protecting our commerce and our cities brought speedily into life; a rebellion formidable in its moral significance and numbers crushed; a citizen soldiery returning peacefully to their homes; the Government for the most part meeting every demand, and with equal fidelity the debt created to maintain our unity. Take the years since intervening; see what has been done—the farms made; the cities built; the States reconstructed and populated; the wealth added; the numerous enterprises inaugurated and carried out. I say, glance at these things and many more I might mention; and then remember that this was all done with a paper currency exclusively; that during all this time the currency was this "irredeemable paper." Why, sir, you may trace all the years of the nation before the war, with coin bursting the coffers of every bank; with "eagles and half-eagles" eager to fly from the national Treasury to the pockets of the people; with golden toys for children and doubloons distending every man's silken purse, and you find no parallel for the prosperity and advancement attending us since its close. And when I recur to other epochs in our history—as after the war of 1812, of which Mr. Benton declared there was "no price for property or produce; no sales but those of the sheriff or the marshal; no purchasers at the execution sales but the creditor or some hoarder of money; no employment for industry; no demand for labor; no sale for the product of the farm; no sound of the hammer but that of the auctioneer knocking down property; stop laws, property laws, replevin laws, stay laws; loan-office laws; the intervention of the legislature between the creditor and the debtor; this was the business of legislation in three-fourths of the Union, of all south and west of New England"—and compare this sad but truthful picture with the bright one following our recent most exhaustive struggle—a contest beside which that of 1812 was a mere skirmish—I say when I make such a comparison, and I might make others, I am led to ask whether our currency has not had something to do with this prosperity; whether we, or any other nation, under circumstances half so trying, with a different currency, ever accomplished a tithe of what we have; and whether we are true to ourselves or our history if, without a word of challenge, we allow a currency which has been so potential for good to be stigmatized and ostracized, tried, found guilty, and condemned, without even benefit of clergy.

And keeping these things in mind, Mr. President, there is in this connection a grand fact I will not permit our friends to lose sight of, and that is, the people are satisfied with the currency. Remembering, as has been often said in this debate, that this is the people's Government, this fact is most important, I don't care where you go; in the Green Mountains of Vermont, along the lakes and on the prairies of Wisconsin, with the busy and active people of the Empire State—East West, North and South—everywhere, they never had a currency which was so uniformly acceptable. We never gave the people a circulating medium in which they had such unlimited confidence. It is alike good and current everywhere. It has been so—aside from those who did not or have not now faith in the Government—from the time these legal-tenders were issued, and this faith has increased and is becoming stronger and stronger every day. This, I repeat, I count a great fact in the inquiry; for upon this faith and confidence rests largely the value of any currency, and it is most unwise to ignore it in settling the problem before us.

But we have been told that these greenbacks are "lies," "frauds," "stuff," "engraved falsehoods," "promises without verity," "shams," "every dollar one hundred cents of lies." These, and like names and epithets, have been applied to our national currency. And with what justice, with what propriety? How much does such language tend to elevate the character of our nation, or inspire the people with confidence in their circulating medium? How many men actually believe that all these things are warranted, when the facts are known? Mr. President, I deeply regret that any one should believe these things to be true, or deem it necessary to utter such sentiments.

Not thus reasoned our gallant soldiers, when month after month the welcome paymaster gladdened their weary march or inactive camp life with his strong box filled with these "lies." Not thus did they esteem them, when, the last gun stacked, the last battle won, peace proclaimed, they received from a grateful country their ever so small pittance, as bounty or otherwise, in this same "stuff." Not thus do these same men now think, who, maimed in their country's service, and are paid promptly the debt due them in these same "frauds." Not thus do our people feel, who, when financial dangers threaten or are upon them, insist and clamor for even more of these same "lies," "frauds"—more of this same "stuff" and "dishonored paper." No, sir; not thus did the people of all classes feel during the recent financial storm. And right here again is a cardinal, grand, practical fact, worth more than all theories, all speculations, all abstract rules, namely, that as the crisis intensified, these "lies," "frauds," and this "stuff" appreciated in value. Will you go back to other like storms? How eagerly did men then rush from their homes, by night as well as by day, to dispose of their bank-paper, paying debts which would have otherwise gone unpaid; loaning their money without interest and without security. Men turned their pockets inside out to be certain that the last dollar was gone. With this "stuff," these "lies," and "frauds," and "shams," and "promises without verity" as our currency, however, every man kept every dollar he could in his pocket, hid it away in his chest or strong box, putting an additional lock upon his iron safe. The country never witnessed anything like it. Bankers held on with closer grip to this "dishonored paper;" merchants eagerly sought to dispose of their goods for this "stuff;" farmers most willingly bartered their products for these "lies," and men were seldom happier than when defrauded by being unwillingly forced to take wallets of these same "frauds."

No, Mr. President; I repeat that this one fact is of more value in this discussion than tomes of mere theory, or all that can be said of the effect of this so-called depreciated currency in producing the panic.

But gold is the currency of the world; the faith of the nation is pledged to pay coin for these notes. Years have elapsed and this pledge is not met. We stand guilty of bad faith and are dishonored in the eyes of the civilized world, and until we make them equal with gold we are in the attitude of a trader with his paper gone to protest. All this and more is said by contractionists and substitutionists. Let us see. What were the circumstances under which these legal-tenders were issued? We are not standing now upon a technicality—upon the mere letter of the contract—but looking at the facts, at the history, at those things which every person knew, and upon which all, the nation and citizens, persons at home and abroad, acted, and from these we are to inquire what duty and honesty demand.

And now does not every one know that these notes were issued to meet an absolute pressing necessity in our struggle? They were a necessary convenience and a convenient necessity. They were, technically, as much and as absolutely dishonored one week after their issue as they have been since or are now. If due in the commercial sense, then they were due presently, or at their date, and every hour thereafter they were dishonored. Is any one prepared to pass a judgment so harsh, so severe, so at war with essential facts? Is the nation which has accomplished so much; which under circumstances unparalleled in the history of nations has met its enormous interest lien, and is gradually reducing the principal—I say, is such a nation to be adjudged guilty of bad faith and liable, if possible, to proceedings in bankruptcy because it fails promptly to pay gold for these notes, one kind of legal tender for another? Does any man, at home or abroad, believe it was ever so "nominated in the bond;" or if so nominated by the letter, that this was its spirit or that it was ever so meant or understood? Then, too, these notes are made a legal tender. As such they have as much paying value and are made equal with gold. To make good every dollar thus inscribed every particle of the property of this vast country, public and private, is pledged, both now and for all coming time. If this country is to be maintained, then we know that for all the purposes for which we use money in our internal trade these notes are as good as they can be made. Then, too, admitting that they are to be redeemed in coin, I deny that the nation has acted in bad faith. We have not diverted a dollar which should have gone to their redemption to any other purpose. We have not added to the volume one dollar in violation of our agreement. We have husbanded our resources with fair economy; received these notes for all the purposes contemplated by the law of their creation. Day after day they have gradually appreciated or approximated the so-called gold standard; and I affirm that, quite as soon as any one, looking at the condition of our nation, the circumstances surrounding the contract, and disposed to deal justly and fairly with the question, can expect, the day these men "long have sought" will be reached, and the "balancing-pole" which so disturbed the vision of my friend from Vermont can be thrown away.

I must not forget, however, as has been urged and reurged, and especially by the Senator from Ohio in his most elaborate and able speech, that we are charged with acting dishonorably and violating our plighted faith, because, in 1869, we pledged ourselves to make provision, at the earliest practicable period, for the redemption of these notes in coin. And just here, as to the legal obligation, lies the stress of the argument. I confess that I cannot see its force. Will any one tell me who is to judge of this? If I in my place determine, after the best thought and exercising the utmost care, that it is not practicable, am I acting in bad faith? If the entire Congress so determine, thus influenced, do they violate any plighted faith? If a majority, with a like desire to do right, so conclude, who can charge that the pledge is violated? What are the elements which should enter into the inquiry? They are many. If Congress concludes that the people and all the interests of the nation will suffer more from statutory resumption, whether speedy or tardy, than from leaving the result to the laws of trade, who shall say that the practicable period has arrived? If it shall be concluded, acting for the people, and ever so strongly impressed with the deep significance of the pledge, that to issue interest-paying bonds and borrow gold to redeem these notes is neither politic nor what the people demand, tell me under what rule of construction any one can say that we are improperly or unreasonably refusing to make the required provision? If it should be deemed that, if this provision is made, taxation must, to meet it, be increased, more interest paid, the banks crippled, and general disaster follow, who shall gainsay that Congress would be justified in hesitating before so ordering? These, and many other aspects of the case, might be presented, either or all of which would conclusively show how unfounded is all this clamor about "plighted faith."

It is no answer to these suggestions that "nine long years" have elapsed since the issue of these notes and still we do not pay gold; nor that the pledge is of "five years' standing." If the period was practicable four years since, or more, then there was just as much bad faith in not acting then as now, unless it is now more practicable; and the time elapsing is of no value, except as a part of the argument. In and of itself it amounts to nothing. The real inquiry is, is it practicable? And I defy any one, upon any rule of ethics or law, looking to the very letter and full spirit of this pledge, to show how there is any bad faith, if Congress, looking over the whole ground, shall determine in good faith, having a due regard to the rights of the bill-holders and the best interests of the Government—for it will not do in this inquiry or at any stage of this discussion, as many are apt to do, to divorce the people and their interests from the Government—that now is not the practicable period contemplated by the enactment. I defy any one to show that in that case there is a departure from the purest morality. It will not do to say, "O, it is practicable; we can do it, and therefore we should." That begs the question, or misstates it. The pledge is not that we will when we can, when we have the power simply; that we could have done, by borrowing money or otherwise, at the date of the pledge; but we are to do it as soon as practicable. Nor, I repeat, will it do to say it is practicable, for that begs the question. I determine that upon my responsibility as a Senator. Others do the same. And, in the name of the good faith of the nation—in the name of its people who have accomplished so much, as earnestly anxious to preserve our good name, and standing, as I hope, as firmly for a high public morality as any one, I protest that no one shall be allowed to charge Congress or the nation with violating its pledge of honor, because it, in the exercise of an admitted right, determines that the practicable period for a redemption by law has not arrived. And especially do I ask that the nation and its good name shall not be compromised by those who, while so earnestly imploring our want of high moral action, would turn bill-holders over to the uncertain and not very well-defined choice between gold and another promise to pay of our own creation, and in which we incorporate our own terms. If now is the time to keep the pledge, let us do it as "nominated in the bond," and not in a manner of our own choosing.

But still it is said these notes are not as good as gold; that they must be made such, and that by law. It is said of a Boston merchant, who always took a business view of things, that he felicitously remarked of a certain poetic impracticable that he was one of those men who have soarings after the infinite and divings after the unfathomable, but who never pays cash. And so our friends say, "It is true that these notes will pay next to all debts; they are most acceptable to the people; but they will not bring gold!" They admit the currency has stood the storm better than any we ever had in a severe panic; but it is not cash! They concede that for ten years, and during a period the most trying in the nation's history, it has stood the severest test far better than any paper we have ever had; but we do not redeem it in gold! They know that men everywhere lay it away, without dread or fear that it will ever be worthless, and with confidence that it is incomparably the best paper currency ever given them; but it is not gold, and something must be done to make it such or equal to it! Well, now, how will you do it? I answer, if this is so desirable, or if this is a sine qua non, (of which I may say more hereafter,) you can never do it by any mere statutory edict. When we have that prosperity in trade which all should labor for; when we so work in our own borders as to restore that humbug in the estimate of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the balance of trade, permanently, or for a time, in our favor, then the grand fact (as our friends esteem it) is accomplished, by laws natural enough, by all well understood, and more effectually than all the laws we could pass on the subject, if we made one every day for years. You cannot add to the volume of gold except by discoveries, and to attempt to force specie payments and give us a gold currency you would not have, as has been said, sufficient to run a respectable "pea-nut stand in each State in the Union."

But why this struggle to get to specie payments? I am answered, because it is the world currency, the basis of all solidity and equability in trade, so acknowledged by all civilized countries; that this has been accepted for "four thousand years" as the basis for all other currencies, for in this they have all ultimately to be paid.

I admit that this has been so, and perhaps I shall be called a most unreasonable radical if I dare insinuate that it should not continue to be the rule. And yet you will allow me to suggest that possibly the world will get over some of its old notions on this subject. I think it is even now breaking away from not a few of them. The nations are being brought nearer together. They are coming to have more and more confidence in each other. They know more and more of the internal affairs of each. They are no longer treated as so completely separated or foreign to each other, nor hostile in their aims and purposes. All are regarded as working more and more in harmony for the upbuilding of a common humanity. And men are coming to think that the grand commerce of the world has outgrown the necessity of the long-boasted specie basis or its necessity as the only safe basis for currency. Each day makes more common, in the commerce of the world, bills of exchange and like paper, by which millions of money pass without a dollar in gold or other coin. And as these things continue, as this feeling of confidence increases with increased culture and a broader and deeper civilization, old theories will pass away, and the world accept and adopt a currency not cumbrous, nor yet one which it will be found can be better utilized, and which is, in fact, largely needed in the arts arriving to such perfection in this advancing civilization.

But whether this is true or not—and I do no more than throw out these suggestions—at present the inquiry is, what are we to do in view of the condition of the country and its needs in the future? And having said so much, and criticised somewhat other theories and plans, I should hardly be justified if I did not at least hint at what I would do. Very briefly I proceed to do so, with not a little doubt, however, whether I shall be more fortunate in being understood than have those preceding me.

In the first place I would not substitute "demand notes" for "greenbacks." With our revenues from all sources to probably prove insufficient to meet our interest and the ordinary expenses, I am not prepared to add twenty millions or more to our burden in the shape of interest; and yet this, as I understand it, would be the result if we replace the legal-tenders (to the amount of three hundred and fifty to four hundred millions) with demand notes bearing 6 per cent. interest. This we do not want. This we cannot stand. There is neither policy nor necessity to sanction it.

If left to myself, and starting anew, I would have but one paper currency, and that issued directly by the Government. I concede that our national banks owe their existence to a necessity, and I freely admit that they have nobly sustained themselves in the recent fearful panic; indeed, to their admirable management and our unequaled currency we owe our safety. But it is worthy of inquiry whether this necessity longer exists. I do not believe the Government ought to pay interest upon a currency which it guarantees, and which owes much, if not all, of its value to the known and recognized ability and duty of the Government to keep it good. Of course, in any event, such time should be given as might be necessary to wind up these banks, without loss or injury to stockholders or any one interested in their affairs. Of course, also, having this currency, banking without issue would be free, as it should be. But if we cannot have this one currency, then I should favor free banks, with power to issue as now, and with all the safeguards now in the law and as many more as prudence and wise forethought might suggest, going as far even as to adopt the English rule, which makes the stockholder individually responsible to the extent of all his property for the payment of all the debts of the corporation.

My preference is, however, for a homogeneous currency, issued by the Government, all a legal tender, and upon which it shall pay no interest. I am ready, I believe, if I can see my way to it, consistent with our obligation as to our coin debt, to provide that a certain per cent. of the duties on imports shall be paid in these notes. And this for the reason, to state it briefly, that the amount of the currency has in and of itself but little, if any, influence on the value of coin. Make the currency better, if not entirely good, by declaring, as far as you can, that it shall be received for all the purposes you receive gold, and you have taken a long step in the direction desired. For the Government we need gold to pay the interest debt. From the imports we receive largely more than is necessary for this, and a declaration that a certain per cent., without interfering with the needed quantum of gold, may be received in greenbacks, would tend certainly and largely to bring gold and currency side by side.

Then, too, I would change the form of these notes, so that instead of being technically or in form a promise, they would have stamped upon them simply their denomination, as gold and silver has; being to all intents and purposes money, and not a promise to pay in something else of no greater legal value.

The basis would be and should be found in the existence of the nation—in its stability, its honor, and its unity. And then, too, we would be relieved of what to me is almost if not quite preposterous—the redemption of one currency with another, (both legal tenders.) There should be no such distinction; for if one is better than the other, then why have the poorer or the worse? Why not have the better, and none other? But for a paper currency, I repeat, I would prefer, as I know the people would, a circulation of one creation and one value. Let it be such that every debtor can use it to pay debts, and which every creditor will be compelled to take. Let it be such as will, as near as possible, command universal confidence. This currency we are providing as a medium of exchange at home, and not for international trade. For the present we need not go beyond; for if we well and carefully attend to our domestic interests and home trade, the settlement of our foreign balances when against us (and this, of course, is to be avoided) will probably present its own means of solution or take care of itself. The question is, where is this currency of one nature and existence to come from? I answer again, not from the States, nor from individuals, nor from corporations, but from the National Government—the one sovereign power, in which the people have the greatest confidence and find the greatest security.

Then in this, as in all our financial legislation, we should look to a system and not a policy merely. We owe it to the people to give them a currency, and upon a system as stable, and yet as conformable to their situation, trade, and wants as possible. And to meet this latter demand is, to my mind, the most important element in the problem now before us. Our country is unlike others. We have a vast territory. Our population is scattered. And though we have been told that it is business and trade which demands money, I submit that this trade, scattered over an immense area, needs more money than if confined to a small territory. The products of one section are needed by another, and the wares and manufactures of some have to be removed to meet the wants of still others. We have an active, driving, enterprising people. Such a population needs a greater volume of currency than if they were less enterprising, less active in the pursuits of life. We build cities in a day, and make States in a fortnight. Fortunes are now estimated by millions. Such is the amount of our trade and the diversity of our employments; such the extent of our country, and the distance we are compelled to move our wares and products, that at some seasons of the year we need more money than at others. Thus, when the crops are to be moved from the great prairies of the West, we need more money than when trade is dull. We know that millions are needed for this, while comparatively small sums will answer when there is no such demand. In the language of the last annual message:

> It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency, or money, is required to transact the legitimate trade during the fall and winter months.

Nor must we forget that four millions of people, recently held as chattels, making but little count in the estimate of the circulation needed, are now engaged in all the avocations of life—making farms, engaged in manufactures—and that their wants and the demands of a reviving and each day more active industry in the South call upon us to give them hope and all encouragement. Then, too, there come times of alarm when confidence is checked, and when the circulation is hoarded by those having it in their hands; and such is the ability of men and corporations, by reason of large fortunes, to possess themselves of this currency, that the power to thus hoard is largely increased, and is becoming greater and greater every day. I therefore think it wiser to have a system convertible or elastic, as it is termed. To do this it would seem to be wise to provide for a bond bearing a low rate of interest, say 3.65 per cent., or possibly a little more, but not much, which can command these legal-tenders without interest, while the money is withdrawn, and which may in time be withdrawn with interest to the owner by a repayment of the requisite amount of money. I am in favor of the lowest interest which will certainly make the bonds available for the purpose contemplated; because, in my judgment, the nation pays too much interest, both public and private. When we pay interest in excess of the growth of the country in population and wealth, it certainly does not require any extended figuring to satisfy any one that in time we must become bankrupt. If that increase is represented by 2½ or 3 per cent., (and this I understand to be about the ratio,) then if we continue to pay 5 or 6 per cent. it is only a question of time when the balance will be largely against us, and we must go into liquidation with no very satisfactory showing in the way of assets. I am therefore in favor of the lowest interest.

No, Mr. President; I think it is about time we took a new reckoning. No nation is so literally impoverished as ours by the payment of extravagant interest. We pay it, too, not to home creditors, but annually the country is drained by payments of gold to foreign bondholders; this, too, at a high rate. Money is given to us to be used; and yet no proposition is plainer than if you allow a high rate of interest money will be hoarded until the holder can find a place where to him it will "do most good." And this is especially so when, as now, money accumulates in such fabulous amounts in the hands of a few. There is no monopoly which more loudly calls for restraint and regulation. With gold flowing abroad; with overtrading; with the immense amounts locked up in the commercial centers last fall; with no power in the Government to give us more currency to meet the demand, who needs to go far to explain the panic? It was inevitable. The people just then needed more money, Their trade and wants demanded it. I think they need it now, and they ought to have it.

But, you ask, am I opposed to specie payments? O, no. Far from it. I would be glad if we could reach this end to-day or to-morrow—just as soon as you please. But I beg you not to force it by law. The "terms of the bond" do not require it. A declaration of the statute to this effect will avail but little without the ability to keep it up. You cannot do this, even if you start, in my humble judgment, with the balance of trade against us. For however much it may be decried as a humbug, there is nothing truer than the language of the President in his last annual message, when he said:

> A specie basis cannot be reached and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations.
> Without this, national as well as individual bankruptcy must ensue.

And I repeat that this balance in our favor, if once we get it, must be kept up if we would maintain such payment. If not, the experiment will be a most miserable failure—yea, worse than a failure.

Then, too, as has been well suggested, we must reflect whether—if coming to specie payments by forced legislation by Government and banks alike, of course—the distribution of this coin, owing to the almost numberless banks, about two thousand in all, in the proportion of the capital of each—I say we must consider whether it would not render them an easier prey to designing parties or rings. We must reflect, too, whether, if we declare for specie payments this year or next, our greenbacks will not be absorbed or bought up by capitalists in large quantities at their deplored depreciated value, and held for the gold millennium, and thus retired from circulation, adding again and still further to the scarcity of money, and increasing the stringency in the market. Nor is this impossible, for the certainty or prospect even of 10 to 12 per cent. interest will not probably be neglected by any one having the means to invest. Add to this the probability that the banks would, as a matter of self-preservation, most likely be compelled to retire their circulation for fear of a run upon them, and thus be led to contract the currency—I say consider these things, and I ask if it is not better to keep coin concentrated than to encourage hoarding or increase the chances of runs and panics by division.

But in any event let us do nothing to contract just now. We owe too much as a nation, as States, as corporations, and as individuals, to begin this experiment now. Nothing, in my judgment, could be worse. What do we need? I answer, that policy which will lead us to activity in every department of trade. No stand-still or go-back policy will do. Safety at this time is only to be found by going right ahead as actively, as energetically, as hopefully, as possible. Is there a furnace idle? Encourage it to put in fuel and go ahead. Find you a factory standing still? Give hope and confidence, that every loom may once more give forth the sound of busy industry. Comes there notice that forge, or hammer, or plow, or hoe, or loom, or shovel, or railroad, or car, or mine, or spindle, or any mechanical agency or other industry in all the land is not being used, or is stopped? Bid it in Heaven's name to keep running—keep it active; keep all at work. There is no wealth without actual labor.

This grand central truth we must not forget. To do so is to defy the teachings of all history. Gold, greenbacks, all the imaginable currency however good or redeemable, cannot give us wealth. These are not wealth. In a word, wealth is only that which adds to what we have—that which creates, that which opens up the farm, multiplies the products of our manufactories, brings forth the rich deposits from our mines, and like results. And this is done by labor, without which, I repeat, there can be no wealth. All else is but the standard, the measure, and without encouragement to the only true basis there can be no genuine prosperity. For here bear in mind, what ought to be an axiom in all legislation, that that nation has the most prosperity which gives the best reward to labor, and that the least which, by its legislation or otherwise, stints or starves labor. I therefore repeat that a supine policy now is deadly to our national finances. If we do not give this encouragement we are eaten up with interest; our securities depreciate; our currency becomes more and more so-called "engraved falsehoods." Let us not, then, when no one is complaining of bad faith, but following the merest abstractions, shut our eyes to the actual condition of things, and close furnaces and forges, stop looms and the industries of the country, and intensify the panic now passing away. The nation has wonderful recuperative energies. If we will help, as we should, all will be well. If now we will provide in needed quantity and under proper regulations the required implements; if we will hold and keep down our expenses to the lowest possible amount; and if we will act as well as promise economy, the prosperity which, following the war, was the marvel of the age, the wonder of the civilized world, will still be ours to attest the strength of our nation and the excellence of our Government and its institutions.

Mr. President, a word more and I have done. We are told that everywhere the cry is coming up for a return to specie payments, and protesting against an increase of the currency. This may be true as to hoarders of money, those upon whom fortune has smiled, and who would gladly welcome the addition probably to come to their laughing exchequers. It may be so for the East; but I beg our friends not to mistake the sentiment of the growing and now burdened West. I beg them also to remember that on this as on all questions we must do justice to all sections as far as possible. I would not knowingly do an act to hazard the development or prosperity of any section of this fair land. And this, I must believe, is the sentiment of every Senator on this floor. But let us pause before we act—before we inflict a blow which may prove disastrous to any. To our friends from the States long settled, with their institutions fixed, not surrounded by all the vicissitudes, trials, and uncertainties of a new land, may I not appeal to carefully consider before they so legislate as to make the rich richer and the poor poorer? For I say to them in no sectional spirit, and certainly with no thought of making a comparison in the least invidious, referring to the empire stretching to the "golden shores of the peaceful sea on the West," that, in the language of Mr. Webster, "No one can appreciate his responsibility as a legislator, nor the magnitude of his country, until he leaves his New England home and sees something of this grand empire." And may I be pardoned for adding, in the language of another, and in the same spirit, that truly "it is a majestic region. Its people belong to the nobility of mankind. Its destiny is to rule the world. Its triumph, when it comes, will be complete. Its opportunity is not far in the future. The West is to be the dictator of the Republic." Its sway shall be as beneficent and just as its people are noble and their possibilities infinite.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the "regulations of the currency" is admitted by all to be one of the most difficult problems which falls to the lot of governments to solve, and it is a question which has occupied the attention of the most profound statesmen and political economists of the enlightened nations of the world for the past century; and yet it may be said with truth that no satisfactory solution has been reached.

It is true that severe experience, both in this country and in England, has demonstrated the fact that all the methods which have hitherto been adopted are more or less defective, and fail to meet fully the wants of commerce; but this experience, although pointing out some defects, has failed to show the exact remedy which should be applied.

It is a singular fact that, notwithstanding the constant practical use of money for ages and centuries past, yet the definition of the term itself has not been fully agreed upon; and I find in an able article in the North American Review, as late as 1870, an attempt at a new and rather strange explanation.*

I mention these facts not with any intention of bringing forward a new definition or of proposing any new theory, with the belief that it will solve all the difficult points in this troublesome problem; but simply for the purpose of announcing, at the commencement of what I have to say upon the subject, that I am fully aware of the fact that it is surrounded by difficulties which have puzzled the strongest minds of this and other countries. But the exigencies of the times have thrust it upon us, and the present condition of our monetary affairs requires us to meet it squarely. And now, perhaps more than at any other time during our existence as a nation, it becomes our duty as the representatives of the people and regulators of the currency of our country to study thoroughly all the intricate bearings of the subject, and seek to give permanency to our standard of value and medium of exchange. But this requires time and cannot be done in a few days, yet in the mean time our country, although richer than ever before in all the absolute elements of wealth, is suffering from the want of a sufficient medium of exchange; our factories are more or less paralyzed, commerce is crippled, and large amounts of the farm products of the West are lying idle in the barns and store-houses; and the people are appealing to us for some measure of relief so far as it is in our power to grant it.

I consider it, therefore, as evident that our true policy at present is to take some action to relieve the present stringency of the money market, but at the same time this action should be so shaped as to look forward to a plan maintaining the currency on a secure basis, and if possible better adapted to the wants of our country.

Although there may be a multiplicity of plans proposed, differing in detail, yet it is apparent that all these, no matter how numerous, belong to but two opposite theories: one which contemplates a return to specie payment by a further forced contraction, and one which contemplates an increase of the circulating currency by unlocking that which is hoarded or by direct increase in the amount. Therefore at the very outset we are brought face to face with the fundamental question which is now pressing on our political economists with more force than ever before, "Is a return to specie payment necessary for the stability of our currency?" Political economists may strive to evade it, and legislators may endeavor to push it forward into the future; yet it is the real question that lies at the very base of this subject, and which the rapid increase of the commerce of the world and the advancement of human freedom and intelligence are forcing upon the enlightened nations of the earth.

As a theory this question has generally, and I might say almost universally, been answered in the affirmative both by statesmen and writers on currency and political economy; and if we are to decide from the weight of authority theoretically expressed the answer will, beyond all controversy, be in the affirmative. But in our appeal to these authorities one very important fact should not be overlooked: that in the discussion of questions relating to currency and monetary affairs this point, so vital to the solution, has seldom been raised; the authors, led by the popular notion that a metallic basis is the only true method, have almost universally proceeded upon this assumption, and hence all their plans proposed have had in view a metallic basis both as a standard of value and a medium of exchange. And, as has been truly said by a somewhat recent writer on currency, (Hill's Principles of Currency, page 1:)

> Formerly men who had given long and laborious attention to this subject were, nevertheless, deterred from stating their views publicly because the public mind appeared to have been set fast in this matter, so much so indeed that any attempt to subject the principles upon which our currency laws are based to that calm and patient investigation which has been so eminently successful in the discovery of correct principles, in respect of other matters of practical importance, was as vain as it would have been to scatter seeds on frozen ground.

Hence, I say that they start upon the basis that that is the acknowledged fact, and reason from that basis. The correctness of this statement is apparent in reading the works of such eminent writers as Stewart, Smith, Ricardo, Tooke, Mill, and others, where the overpowering influence of the popular notion of the necessity for a metallic basis shows itself on almost every page, notwithstanding the varied and opposite conclusions at which they arrive, and the diverse remedies proposed.

One practical fact undoubtedly favors this theoretical view, and is probably that from which it arose: that gold and silver are received and recognized throughout the world as a medium of exchange, and a representative of value, thereby forming an international legal tender. And that this will continue to be the case, no matter what laws are passed regulating internal currency, no one pretends to doubt.

Having noticed the theoretical answer to the question, I now ask Senators to look at the facts and say what answer they give to it; whether they show a specie basis to be necessary for permanency or not; or, in other words, whether they show that a metallic basis affords an adequate remedy against fluctuations, stringency, and the evils attributed to a well-regulated paper currency.

As I call attention to a few facts bearing more or less directly on this point, I would ask Senators to bear in mind two things. First, that although I do not intend to advocate a policy which I believe to be entirely opposed to the idea of an ultimate return to specie payment, yet I seek to dispel the notion that it is absolutely necessary to give permanency to our currency. It may be true that, as a general rule, it is the best plan, as it facilitates international trade, as a uniform system of weights and measures would, but I wish to show—and I think I can very clearly—that it is by no means a necessity, and is not at all times best. In the second place, I desire Senators to bear in mind the distinction between standard of value and medium of exchange, functions which are too often confounded, and which do not of necessity belong to one and the same article.

Keeping this distinction in view, I think it will be seen that the facts, so far as they go, give a negative answer to the question, "Is a return to specie payment necessary for the stability of our currency?" And I might even make my language stronger and say that the experience of enlightened nations shows that, as a rule, this is not practical, and that the attempt to carry out this popular theory has been one prolific source of financial disasters and distress.

First, I call attention to the facts which go to show that gold and silver are not absolutely necessary as a standard of value; that although they possess the qualities of indestructibility, purity, and limit in quantity, which render them good mediums of exchange, on the other hand there are strong reasons and evidence showing they cannot remain permanently the standard of value in any country. And I hold it as a self-evident truth that whenever they are deprived of this function they are remanded back at once to the position of simple merchandise, even though they retain their use as mediums of exchange, an assertion which no political economist, so far as I am aware, controverts.

And the first evidence I present is the fact, which is now so forcibly pressing itself upon us, that the volume of gold and silver is wholly inadequate at its present standard to represent the products of labor and the materials of trade, which, it seems to me, ought of itself to settle this question with the strongest advocate of a metallic currency. What Senator is there here who is hardy enough to assert that the gold and silver in the country, or that can be brought into it by legislation, will properly represent the $2,447,000,000 farm products and $4,232,000,000 of manufactured products of our country, if we even suppose these the only things they are required to represent? Suppose the amount of these precious metals to be $100,000,000; this would be but one dollar to sixty-six of these products alone.

It is asserted with a great show of candor that the world has adopted, as a standard unit of value, a given portion of gold and silver; that when this unit is fixed and invariable, all values readily adjust themselves to it, and trade and commerce plow along their accustomed channels unobstructed.

But the very terms "fixed" and "invariable," which are here so confidently assumed, are the very ones, Mr. President, which contain the difficult elements and points in dispute. Gold and silver are natural products of the earth, whose absolute amounts cannot be controlled by the necessities of trade or the action of legislative bodies; a fact which the advocates of specie payments appear wholly to ignore. And I may as well in this connection state another fact well attested by history, but which these gentlemen appear to have overlooked. It is this: that the commerce of the world as it has gradually expanded, feeling itself cramped by the limited amount of specie currency, has been forced to demand a change in the nominal value of the standard, each change being accompanied by a greater or less financial convulsion. On the other hand, the influx from newly discovered mines has had entirely the opposite effect.

Previous to the discovery of America, although the devastating drain upon Europe by the wars of the crusades had long ceased, yet commerce was languishing and was in a great part confined to the Italian States, and metallic coin was the only currency in general use. But as money flowed into European coffers from the New World, traffic extended; and as traffic extended, the necessity for more money arose; action and reaction thus accelerating the progress of improvement. Then it was that silver was found to be an insufficient medium for carrying on the large transactions, even of inland trade, and gold became a necessary part of the currency; but although it was a necessary and efficient part of the current coin, still it was not yet made a standard of value, this function still remaining in silver, to which gold was adjusted. But the demands of commerce pressed too heavily upon the standard for silver longer to retain exclusively this function, although its nominal value had been repeatedly raised to meet this demand, so that the shilling of England, which was originally one-twentieth part of a pound, was in the time of Elizabeth but one sixty-second part of the absolute pound, a nominal increase of more than 300 per cent. A corresponding change had also occurred in other European nations. Yet this expedient failed to preserve to silver its functions as the exclusive standard of value, and gold was admitted as a partner in this use. What, then, becomes of the assumed idea of "fixedness" and "invariableness" of this unit of value, so far as these facts show? The same thing is true in regard to gold, and applies as well to modern times as to the Middle Ages. Again and again have they been adjusted to meet the increasing demands of trade as the increase in population and advance in civilization continued to expand the volume of commerce.

What right have we, Mr. President, to assume the result will be different in the future from what it has been in the past? Will not the population of the world increase in spite of the Malthusian theory? Will not commerce continue to expand?

But we need not appeal to the history of the Middle Ages or of European nations to prove that a metallic standard of value cannot meet all the wants of commerce and national necessities. Had we as a nation clung rigidly to this idea during the late rebellion, what would have been the consequence? Patriotism would have done much and suffered much to maintain our honor and unity, but it could scarcely have furnished the vast amount of material necessary to carry on the war. We were forced to abandon our standard of value and form a new one; and though it was a paper one, it accomplished that which the gold and silver of the country could not do.

But, sir, I may be met with the reply that this is not an applicable case; it was an extraordinary time, a time of urgent necessity. Still, sir, the fact remains that the arbitrary standard accomplished that which the natural standard (as it is called) could not do; and a standard which can maintain itself under such an extraordinary strain we might reasonably assume would answer the wants of trade when the strain was removed.

As touching this point in regard to a metallic standard, I would ask Senators what reason have we to assume that the relative amounts of gold and silver are always and will always remain so nearly uniform that the comparative value of the two will always remain the same? The nations of Europe have been from time immemorial adjusting the relations between these mediums of exchange, even before gold was formally adopted as a standard of value. So troublesome was this question at one time in England that we find an act of William III reciting in the preamble that "the uncertain value of coined gold has been highly prejudicial to trade, and an encouragement to certain evil-disposed persons to raise and fall the same to the great prejudice of the landed men of this kingdom;" and then going on to enact that "after April 10, 1696, no person shall utter or receive guineas at a higher value than twenty-two shillings under a penalty." (Lube's Argument on Gold, question 102.) Showing how keenly trade felt the effect of the fluctuations in the comparative value of these two mediums of exchange. But all these efforts failed to give permanency, and we find the state interfering to adjust the standard up as late as 1816, when the silver shilling is but one sixty-sixth part of a pound weight.

The attempt of the framers of our Constitution to create a double standard of value, gold and silver, has resulted in repeating, though on a diminished scale, the same thing that occurred in England, requiring repeated adjustments to maintain the relative value as expressed by the coins themselves; and now legal-tender notes having been issued by our Government, they form our standard, and gold and silver, although mediums of exchange and legal tender, are, except in California, simply articles of merchandise.

It is therefore evident from these facts that adopting a specie basis does not insure us against fluctuations in value, nor does it imply that the unit of value will remain fixed and invariable. On the contrary, the evidence adduced shows us that notwithstanding the struggle of nations in the past to cling to a specie basis and a metallic standard, the necessities of commerce and laws of trade have compelled repeated changes and adjustments. And I may add, as another strong testimony in the same direction, the present use of a paper currency in most of the enlightened nations of the world. It was felt to be a necessity or it never would have come into competition with gold and silver, which are so universally preferred on account of their intrinsic value and indestructibility.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as presenting these facts and arguments as opposing the idea of an ultimate return to a specie basis, but simply, as stated in the outset, to remove as far as possible that idea so firmly fixed in the minds of many that financial ruin and commercial distress are constantly staring us in the face so long as we are without a specie basis, and that as soon as we can return to it confidence will be restored, commerce revived, and all the productive energies of our country invigorated. Such has been the theory, repeated again and again for a century past; but the evidence furnished by experience does not sustain the theory. What, therefore, is the necessary deduction to be drawn from these facts? It can be but one of two conclusions—either the theory is wrong, or all the attempts to carry out the theory have been materially defective.

Mr. President, if a return to specie payments will cure all our financial evils, why not come to it at once? If the doctrine advanced by its advocates be true, the evils resulting will only be temporary. When our personal health is at stake we swallow the medicine presented by the physician, that we may regain our vigor and strength.

If the doctrine advanced by specie-payment theorists be correct, why not give the medicine at once? We have the power in our hands; repeal all laws which make anything but gold and silver legal tender, and restore these metals to their former functions of standard value. Government will have a little trouble, perhaps, to take up her greenbacks, and commerce will certainly have to pass through some narrow straits; but according to the theory advanced by learned Senators, the clear and open sea is just a little distant ahead.

But, sir, the admission which the advocates of specie payment make here and elsewhere, either directly or indirectly, in regard to the supply of the precious metals, seems to me to be fatal to their theory.

How many are there who will contend that the supply is sufficient to meet the wants of trade? How many are there among our national legislators ready to face the storm which would result from a shrinkage of prices so as to correspond with the amount of gold and silver which can be brought into circulation. Why, sir, in a "memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York" which lies before me, and which leads the van in favor of specie payment, I find this admission, which they are forced to make:

> Whatever policy might have been judicious before, it is vain to talk of contraction now, when three hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks and three hundred millions of national-bank notes are employed unceasingly to keep the wheels of an extended commerce in motion. (Page 8.)

and contradicts all the arguments they have advanced to sustain their position. It is an open admission on the part of those thoroughly acquainted with all the intricacies of the money market that there is not a sufficient amount of the precious metals for use. This is virtually admitting the whole question at issue. If the gold and silver in circulation, or that can be brought into circulation by legislative action, are not sufficient in amount for the business of the country—and the advocates of specie payment generally admit they are not—then it is evident they do not represent the value of the commodities of trade or products of labor, and therefore can neither answer the purpose of a standard of value alone within our country, nor a sufficient medium of exchange. If the demands of commerce are such that as it expands in volume it requires a corresponding increase in the amount of currency or medium of exchange in use, then it is apparent that there is something in the very nature of trade and laws of exchange which will not allow a continual shrinking in the nominal value while the volume is actually increasing. In other words, there is a strong tendency in the natural laws of trade and commerce to maintain a comparatively uniform price of products, even when it requires a strong pressure upon the amount of the circulating medium afloat. The theory of the contractionists or advocates of specie payment, when reduced to a nut-shell, is this, that there is no reason why twenty-five cents may not represent the value of a bushel of wheat in New York as well as $1.50, provided the prices of all other articles of trade and commerce are reduced to the same standard. I hope they do not desire this, yet if their logic is true, then theoretically the iron money of Lycurgus, or the "cowries" of the Africans may answer all the purposes of money; but practical facts, and not theories, are the things we are called to deal with at present.

If we were a new race of beings, just launched into existence, with no debts or contracts, with no history or precedents, with no traditional idea of prices or values, possibly we might call what is now a dime a dollar, and regulate our trade and business by this liliputian standard, but I think it would be a long time before we would span the continent with railways or cleave the ocean with steamships. With a ten-cent currency we would be very likely to have a ten-cent commerce, a ten-cent internal trade, and a ten-cent nation.

But, sir, we are not here to deal with the imaginations of Gulliver, but with stern realities, with the wants of a vast nation, with the necessities of an immense internal trade, with the demands of a people who have grown prosperous under the present money standard, and have become accustomed to the present scale of prices; with a vast net-work of debits and credits.

Apply the theory, then—no matter how correct it may appear on paper—to the case as it stands, and tell me what would be the result. Suppose that by a reduction of the currency wheat was reduced in New York to twenty-five cents per bushel, and other things to a corresponding value, when would the national, State, county, city, and individual debts be liquidated? Does any one fail to see that we would be involved in financial ruin and bankruptcy? Sir, the evil effect would not stop even here, for our civilization would feel the shock, our system of education and means of spreading and increasing intelligence would be crushed, and we would soon be gliding backward toward a state of ignorance and superstition.

I am aware that the advocates of specie payment do not propose any such extreme measure as this, but I do maintain that whenever we contract below that point which experience has shown to be the true and healthy standard, we are so far cramping our energies, and retrograding in a corresponding degree.

What inference, then, are we to draw from these facts which experience is constantly presenting? Most undoubtedly that a healthy and vigorous commerce requires an amount of currency uniformly proportioned to the amount of trade.

Having now discussed these points which have a general bearing upon the subject of a metallic basis, I approach directly the question before us, which may be stated thus: "Is it sound financial policy to take such action at present as shall tend to a moderate increase of our currency?"

One point in this question I think ought to be universally conceded, and that is, that we cannot reach specie payment by a further forced contraction without bringing great distress and probable bankruptcy upon our people. Another point made evident by the late panic is that the amount of currency, as at present arranged, fails to meet the wants of the country, and that some change is necessary to meet the present necessity.

To attempt a review of all the remedies proposed would require more time than I can at present devote to it: therefore I shall confine my remaining remarks to the discussion of but one or two leading propositions.

If "taking action looking to a speedy resumption of specie payment" means anything, it means displacing a portion of the paper currency that gold may be induced to flow in by the consequent increase in the value of the remaining paper; or, it means fixing a day, not far distant, by positive enactment, when the Secretary of the Treasury shall commence to pay gold for legal-tender notes. All other methods proposed are but shifts to avoid the responsibility of meeting the issue fairly and squarely, and although doubtless presented in good faith, yet they are in effect schemes which tend to ease the pain without assisting in the least to cure the disease.

There are but three methods open before us: increase, contraction, or resumption of specie payment by simple operation of law; and if we act at all we must proceed on one or the other of these plans. Anything short of this is only shifting the burden from one shoulder to the other.

It is admitted that contraction is impracticable under the present state of affairs; therefore we may dismiss this from the discussions, for to argue that we can contract by expanding is simply a perversion of terms. If expansion is what we need at present, let it be admitted plainly and unreservedly, and let us at once proceed to take such action as will bring about this result as speedily as the nature of the case will admit of.

If the way to contraction is blocked, then there are but two paths open before us—resumption by direct operation of law, or expansion.

Without attempting to follow out the various plans presented for returning to specie payment, I select the memorial before alluded to as the best and perhaps clearest exponent of this theory. It says, (page 8,) "We have reached the verge of success in bringing gold and currency to a par with each other, and it apparently needs but an announcement by the Secretary of the Treasury that legal-tender notes will be paid in gold at an early day, to annul the present differences between the two," and suggests that the redemption of legal-tender notes be commenced the 4th of May next, but that the power to issue be continued.

This is the money-holders' side of the question, presented in plain and unequivocal language, and is the theory of those who advocate a return to a specie basis reduced to a nut-shell.

Suppose, Mr. President, we pass a law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to commence redeeming legal-tender notes on the 4th of May next, or even the 1st of January, 1875; how is this to bring relief? Will it increase the volume of currency, or unlock any considerable portion of that which is now hoarded up? For each dollar of gold put into circulation a dollar of legal-tender will be withdrawn; and there will be no increase in the amount of currency in circulation, unless we assume, as is done in this memorial, that all legal-tenders will at once come to par, and thus increase the total value of the currency by the amount of the present difference between these and the same nominal amount of gold. Suppose it to be true that the simple promise to redeem would, without the presentation of a single dollar, bring the entire amount of the legal-tender issue to a par with gold, would this afford the relief demanded? Would this place more money in circulation than there is at present? Sir, go further; suppose the utmost that the most sanguine advocate of the theory can possibly claim, that the reaction of this policy upon the national-bank notes, by transferring the required reserve for their redemption into gold or its equivalent, would also bring them up to a par with gold; would even this meet our financial demands; would this supply the wants of the commerce and business of our country? Would this start our mills and manufactories again into full and active operation? Would it unlock the store-houses of the West and pour the grain, beef, and pork into the eastern market? Is there some talismanic power in a dollar in gold that will render it so much more effective in trade than a sound and secure paper dollar? Would this loosen the grasp of those who now cling so firmly to their greenbacks and hide away their national-bank notes? No, sir; they would hold them the firmer as the 10 per cent. would be made to them by holding on and not by letting them out. There would be no more dollars in circulation then than now; the volume of the currency would be just the same then as now. But even this supposition every one knows to be impracticable, for to come to specie payment there must be contraction; the amount of gold and paper must be brought nearer together.

It may be argued that by elevating paper currency to a gold standard each dollar will represent more of the products of labor than it did before, but this would simply be because of a shrinkage in prices consequent upon the contraction, and would be a gain only to those who hold the money, and at an equal loss to those who hold the products of labor, and to labor itself, which is the very basis of our material wealth.

And right here we have revealed to us the two parties to this question, the opposing forces in this contest; those who hold the funds, and those who need them; those who live by interest and percentage, and those who live by labor and traffic.

The same contest arose in England about twenty years ago, when the gold of California and Australia began to flow into the European markets. The money, lenders, the annuitants, and those having fixed incomes, sent forth pamphlets and treatises on currency containing warnings of the danger threatened by this extraordinary influx; they plied Parliament with all the sophistry and arguments of which they were masters, to enact such laws as should maintain their advantages over the producing class and business men of the country.

In one of these pamphlets, which I have here before me, I find this remarkable statement, (I read from Financial Pamphlets, vol. 16, page 28:

> Those who are in debt, or those who think themselves likely to have to borrow money, see a manifest advantage in a state of affairs which promises to alleviate the burden of their present and future incumbrances. The trading classes, in addition to their share of these advantages, expect a great extension of trade—all expect a reduction in taxation, and exclaim against any interference with a natural event which offers these advantages, for the sake of a few capitalists. It seems hopeless to attempt to meet such an array of opponents, by arguments on the abstract propriety of maintaining a steady currency, yet it is very much to be wished that they should be met on this ground.

This, sir, is a confession of the very principle for which we who advocate a moderate increase of the currency are now contending. And when the chancellor of the exchequer, (as you will find on page 30 of the same pamphlet,) wisely looking to the welfare of the great mass of the people of England, announced in his financial statement "that the discovery of gold has established credit in this country in a manner which no political economist could ever have imagined; that it has increased and confirmed credit, and immensely increased the employment of the people;" those who had been striving to limit the standard of value to silver alone felt all their sophistry scattered to the winds by the announcement of these facts. The struggle now, sir, is the same in principle as then; the results which flowed from the increase of currency then by the influx of gold will follow the moderate increase of our currency now.

Our trouble now does not arise from the character of our currency; it does not arise from the fact that there is a difference between gold and the paper currency, but from the fact that we do not have enough of it. The complaint which reaches us from the trading, manufacturing, and producing classes is not that our money is worthless or depreciated, but that the amount is insufficient. Give them the supply needed and all the fine-spun theories and intricate sophistries of financiers will soon be scattered to the winds as they were in England. The currency per se is good enough; it is a larger amount that is wanted. Give this to the people, and then you can, at your leisure, produce your arguments and mature your plans which are to reach far in the future. The starving man cannot patiently sit down to discuss the various effects of food upon the system before eating of the supply brought him; you must first satisfy his hunger and then he will listen calmly to your philosophy.

And right here I wish again to appeal to the memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce on this particular point; and I refer to it because it is presumable the authors understood thoroughly all the arguments in favor of the policy they advocate. They assert (page 8) that "with an acknowledged issue of $356,000,000 of legal-tenders the banks have found it difficult to draw from the circulation over five-and-twenty millions in a time of most urgent need." Does this indicate that the people feared the character of the currency? It seems to me, sir, that it indicates they feared more to trust the banks than the greenbacks.

Suppose that during the late panic some good genii had suddenly changed all the legal-tender notes into gold; would the run upon the banks have been any less than it was? Would the business men have felt the current setting inward any more freely to supply their wants? Would the financial storm have been thereby averted? Certainly not. Depositors would have been just as eager to withdraw their deposits; banks would have been just as powerless to afford relief as they were with the paper currency. It is just as true that $100 in gold cannot liquidate a debt of $500 in gold as it is that $100 of paper money cannot liquidate a debt of $500 in paper.

Where then, sir, is the force of the arguments in favor of this method of a speedy return to specie payments? What are the financial forces which are thereby to be put into operation, and to give renewed activity and vigor to our business life? How is changing a dollar from a green to a yellow to be equivalent to multiplying it by two? This, if true, is a species of alchemy a little too profound for my comprehension. The yellow may represent twice as much labor as the green, yet, numerically, it is the same; the difference is in the price, not the dollars; it will only pay the same amount of debt.

But suppose, after all, we yield to this old song of the siren with golden ringlets, and direct the immediate redemption of legal-tender notes, will Senators please inform me—and I am sure they ought to be able to do it, for their arguments were able, but their sophistry exceeded their ability—where the Secretary of the Treasury is to obtain the metal, the gold and silver, for the redemption of this amount of currency? Do they not know that the moment the Treasury is required to redeem the greenbacks in gold, every national bank in the country will be required to redeem in gold at the same time? The one affects the other. Their relations are so intimate that one cannot redeem without the other. When you have seven hundred millions or more of currency in the country, and a little over one hundred millions of gold and silver in the country, will some Senator please tell me how you are going to redeem that currency in gold? We know well enough from past experience that at such a moment the financial harpies would rush into the money market and, cornering the gold, leave the Government powerless to relieve. Sir, there is a moral power in this reserve which they have sought to break ever since that day when it crushed their schemes.

There are many who firmly believe that a return immediately to a specie basis, though oppressive for a time, would ultimately prove most beneficial; but I, for one, can see benefit only to the money-holders and those who receive interest and have fixed incomes. I can see as a result our business operations crippled and labor reduced to a mere pittance; I can see the beautiful prairies of my own State, which were beginning to bloom as gardens, with the cheerful homes, rising like white towers along the pathway of improvement, again sinking back to idleness; I can see the hopes of the industrious farmer blasted as he burns his corn for fuel because the price will not pay the cost of transportation; I can see our people of the West groaning and burdened under taxation to pay the debts of the States, counties, and cities, incurred when money was more abundant, and bright hopes of the future were held out to lead them on; I can see the people of our Western States who are producers reduced almost to the condition of serfs, to pay the interest on our State, county, and other public and private debts to the money-lenders of the East. With all this so plainly before me, I am forced to raise my voice against any such attempt at present.

It is said by some that the West does not call for more currency. I admit the statesmanship, the ability, and the learning of the gentlemen who make this declaration; but while they speak for their own constituents, I trust they will allow me to speak for mine. When you tell me that the West desires no more currency I cannot agree to that proposition, nor can I admit it. If you, gentlemen, who never appear to think of any persons except the bankers, the brokers, the money-lenders, and the insurance companies, and who live in large cities, believe this to be the case, pass from the sidewalks of the magnificent streets of your city into the rural districts, and ask the man who lives in his rural home what he desires. He will tell you that the money is all held in the hands of a few men; that he is being impoverished; that his farm is mortgaged, and is about to be taken up by some moneyed man at a very low figure.

Having discussed the objections which presented themselves to a forcible attempt to resume specie payment, I will close this part of the argument with a table showing the amount of gold imported and exported for the past ten years. I state the proposition, and believe it to be correct, that this country cannot resume specie payment until trade with other nations is more nearly equalized; that so long as the balances are against us, as they are to-day, every attempt at specie payment will be futile and will bring distress and calamity upon the people of this country. Now, let us see how we stand with reference to gold exported and imported for the last ten years. The imports and exports of coin and bullion into and from the United States for the past ten years have been as follows:

Years.	Imports.	Exports.
1864	13,115,612	100,321,731
1865	9,810,072	64,618,124
1866	10,700,092	82,643,374
1867	22,070,475	54,976,196
1868	14,188,368	84,197,920

Gentlemen tell us that while we are exporting five hundred millions of gold in ten years more than we receive, we can return to specie payments with about one hundred millions of gold in the country and seven hundred millions of paper currency. This may be financial philosophy; it may be financial statesmanship; but I must confess that my intellect fails to perceive the greatness of that proposition. I leave that branch of the argument by saying that you will have to export far less gold and will have to import far more into the country before you can redeem your paper currency by a metallic currency.

But, sir, as soon as those who desire to represent truly the wants of the laboring class, producers and tradesmen of the country, and those who may be more or less burdened by debts contracted in carrying on their business, as well as all other classes, propose to relieve them by a moderate increase of the currency, the cry comes up from the money-lenders, gold-holders, life-insurance officers, and annuitants that gold is already beginning to go up at the very mention of such a proposition. Sir, it is not that gold rises and falls in accordance with the increase or diminution of paper currency. Gold has been lower since the Secretary of the Treasury commenced issuing the $44,000,000 of reserve than it has been for the last nine years. No, sir; the price of gold is regulated, just as the price of any other article of merchandise is, by the supply and demand. It is needed in this country for but two purposes: to pay interest on the public debt and pay duties on imports. I have labored pretty hard for a few days past to get the facts and figures to verify every proposition that I make, as far as I can, and I have here the figures showing the price of gold from January, 1865, down to January, 1874:

Date.	Price.	Difference per cent.		Date.	Price.	Difference per cent.
1865—January	234⅛	....	....	1869—December	119¼	Fall	24⅛
May	128⅜	Fall	106	1870—January	123⅛	Rise	4
October	149	Rise	20⅛	March	110¼	Fall	13
1866—March	136½	Fall	12¼	July	122⅜	Rise	12⅛
April	125	Fall	11½	November	110¼	Fall	12⅛
May	141½	Rise	16⅜	1871—September	115⅝	Rise	5⅜
June	167⅞	Rise	26⅜	December	108⅜	Fall	7
September	143½	Fall	24½	1872—August	115⅝	Rise	7¼
December	131½	Fall	12	December	111⅜	Fall	4⅛
1867—September	146⅜	Rise	15½	1873—April	119¼	Rise	7⅜
December	133	Fall	13⅜	September	114	Fall	5⅛
1868—August	150	Rise	17	October	108	Fall	6
1869—May	144⅛	Rise	12⅜

Thus it will be seen that the price of gold has been on a sliding scale downward from 1865 to the present day, and during the crisis, and during the issuance of a portion of the reserve of greenbacks, it has been lower than at any time since the date first mentioned. By examining this table you will find that the variations in the price of gold are not regulated by the amount of currency in any way whatever, but are regulated by the time of payment of duties and interest and according to the bulls and bears of New York, without any reference whatever to the greenbacks or the currency, the amount great or small.

Now, sir, I desire to call the attention of Senators who are opposed to the theory of a moderate increase, and who speak of us as trying to do that which will injure the country, to a few facts. Look back over the past ten years and tell me when in the history of our country it has advanced more in all the elements of wealth and prosperity, even with that paper currency which some Senators on this floor are so anxious to get clear of, and which they now denounce as "failed paper," "irredeemable currency," "a lie upon its face," &c. The difference between it and gold, although occasionally changing fortunes between the pockets of the bulls and bears of Wall street, has not checked the onward march of improvement in the nation; and despite all the tilts against it by the knights of the exchange, the farmers of the West have been expanding their fields and replacing their log cabins with tasteful cottages and comfortable dwellings. Hume, who I suppose will be considered pretty good authority, long ago remarked in reference to a corresponding state of things in England to that which exists here at the present time, that—

> In every kingdom, in which money begins to flow in greater abundance than formerly, everything takes a new face; labor and industry gain life, the merchant becomes more enterprising, the manufacturer more skillful and diligent, and even the farmer follows his plow with greater alacrity and attention. * * * But when currency is diminishing, the workman has not the same employment from the manufacturer and merchant, though he pays the same price for everything in the market. The farmer cannot dispose of his corn and cattle, and other products of his labor. The poverty, begging, and the sloth that must ensue are easily foreseen.

Hume was speaking in reference to England when she made the attempt, which some Senators are now desirous that we should make, of a return to specie payments by force of law.

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] if I understood him rightly, argued that an increase of currency would work injuriously to the farmers of the West; that a difference between the circulating medium and gold bore hard upon them. Now let us compare facts and figures with theory and see whether they tally.

The State of Illinois has in ten years increased the value of its real and personal estate, in round numbers, from $872,000,000 to $2,122,000,000. And Missouri, although groaning under a "redundant currency," which her Senator wishes to remove, in the same time has increased her real and personal estate from five hundred and one millions to twelve hundred and eighty-five millions; Indiana from five hundred and twenty-nine to twelve hundred and sixty-eight millions; and Massachusetts from eight hundred and fifteen to twenty-one hundred and thirty-two millions. Nor has the increase been less rapid in the manufacturing interests alone; the total value of the products of this branch of industry in Illinois running up, during the same period, from $57,000,000 to $205,000,000; while those of the whole country have been swelled from eighteen hundred and eighty-six millions to the enormous sum of forty-two hundred and thirty-two millions; and those of Missouri, despite the theory of her Senator, have increased fivefold—from forty-two to two hundred and six millions; and even Massachusetts has doubled her score, rising from two hundred and fifty-five to five hundred and fifty-three millions.

In order to verify the statements I make here, I introduce the following tables of the growth of the United States, and some of the States, in the value of real and personal property, of farms, and of manufactured products. Of course Senators have all examined the census report, and it is not necessary to read the figures for their benefit, but I will read them merely for the purpose of hearing them myself. [Laughter.]

Is this, sir, one of the evil effects of what is called by the Senator from Missouri a redundant paper currency? If it is, I earnestly hope it may continue. Sir, the broad prairies, dotted as they are with pleasant homes, which have sprung into existence within the last ten years, present a living and direct contradiction to the theory of that honorable Senator. Strange as it may appear, yet it is true, that notwithstanding all these facts, we see Senators so wedded to a theory, that they strive with all their powers of argument and oratory to convince us that this paper currency is fraught with danger to the business of the country, and in their speeches in favor of specie payment refer to England, with her thirty-two millions of population and what they estimate at six hundred millions of currency, as having a larger volume of commerce than we have. Admit this to be true for the sake of the argument, although I shall prove the contrary before I am through, will the gentlemen extend the comparison to the effect also upon the people? Will they draw the parallel between the laboring classes—the producers of that country—with the same classes in this country? Are they willing, with the adoption of that financial system, to see our laboring classes reduced to an average of two shillings per day? If they are in favor of bringing about such a condition of affairs in our country, the method they propose is most assuredly the one to effect their purpose. I prefer to see the day of specie payment postponed as long here as it was in England at the commencement of the present century, rather than to see this state of things brought about in our country. Already the cry of the hungry laborer is rolling up from our cities—but the preliminary mutterings, I fear, of the coming storm which may soon burst upon us with all its fury, unless the stringency of the times be soon relieved. It calls to mind the result of English policy which gentlemen so strongly recommend to us—the fearful bread riots of her cities. I prefer to see the prosperity which we have had since the war under republican rule and an "irredeemable" paper currency (so called) continue, than to see the business of our country prostrated and our laborers reduced to beggars to carry out a theory. While I desire to protect the interests of all, yet my first and great object is to relieve the great mass of our people so far as possible of the burdens which press upon them in consequence of the present state of monetary affairs.

As reference is made to England by Senators who favor contraction and oppose any expansion, let us see what has been the condition of that country under the two systems. And for this purpose I quote from Bowen's American Political Economy, page 415, (first edition:)

> It was this depreciation of the currency which carried England triumphantly through the war, which enhanced rents and profits, gave unprecedented activity to manufactures and commerce, kept the laboring population employed, enabled the Government to raise enormous loans without difficulty, and made the people bear with ease and cheerfulness an amount of taxation which they can now hardly contemplate without shuddering.
> It is undeniable that, during the greater part of that period, (from 1793 to 1814,) the trade of the country was in a state of unexampled prosperity. In no twenty-two years of our history, of which we have authentic accounts, has there ever been so rapid an increase of production and consumption as in the twenty-two years ending with 1814. It is not going too far to say, that without the high prices of those years Wellington could not have driven the French out of Spain, or triumphed at Waterloo.
> The dark hour came when, after the close of the war, it was thought necessary to take measures to contract the currency, restore the former value of money, and submit to the consequent fall of prices.
> There was from 1814 to 1816 (a period of rapid contraction of the currency) a very general depression in prices of nearly all productions and in the value of all fixed property, entailing in consequence losses and failures among the agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, mining, shipping, and building interests, which marked that period as one of most extensive suffering and distress.

That is what Mr. Bowen says of the attempt to come to specie payments in 1814 and 1816 by the Parliament of Great Britain, after they had had unexampled prosperity for twenty-two years under what you call a depreciated currency.

Mr. MORTON. And that was by a law forcing it.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. Mr. Bowen says that great distress followed the attempt to come to specie payments after the unexampled prosperity of the preceding years. And yet statesmen here are not willing to profit by the experience of past ages and the experience of other Governments who have attempted the same thing that is being attempted to-day. Will gentlemen stand by their own illustrations? Let them remember that this was not written to suit the present occasion, but years previous to the present panic.

I now propose to refer to some of the arguments which have been presented here in favor of resumption of specie payments, which I have not hitherto replied to specially.

The first to which I shall allude is that of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] in regard to the moral obligation of the Government to redeem its greenbacks with gold. One would be led to think from his remarks that the holders of these bills are thundering at the door of the Treasury, appealing in tones of despair for their redemption, lest these notes should become in a few days worthless shinplasters on their hands. Now, Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator, I must say that such a proposition, if uttered on the stump, would be considered an ad captandum argument, being an appeal to theory and hereditary prejudices, which no movement of the public mind or evidence obtained from our monetary affairs sustains. And, as has been well remarked by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] the fact that in the very midst of the panic gold fell to 103 is incontrovertible evidence of public confidence in the character of the present currency—a confidence which one of the wildest panics of our history did not shake in the least.

The Senator from Missouri not only proceeds upon a gratuitous assumption which I do not think is warranted by the facts, but also upon a theory which is wholly incorrect. If I give you my note for $100, the legal presumption is that it is payable in legal money; but does it necessarily follow that there is no way of my discharging that debt, both legally and morally, without the payment of a single dollar in money? I may have a horse which you desire and willingly accept in full satisfaction of the note. Suppose the Government should offer to pay in convertible bonds for these greenbacks, would not every dollar thus paid, if willingly accepted by the holder, be a full satisfaction of the promise upon its face, with which no one has any right to complain if the purchaser of the bonds is satisfied with the transaction? Suppose a part of the duties on imports are made payable therewith, is not every dollar so paid in a fair and satisfactory redemption of it? I therefore say that the Senator's idea that the Government can only maintain her honor by paying out a dollar in gold for each dollar in greenbacks is erroneous. She will pay every dollar of it when it can be done without detriment to the Treasury or injury to her citizens; and that is what is meant by "as soon as practicable on her part," which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] dwells on so much.

I therefore say the theory of the Senator from Missouri is erroneous; and if the theory is erroneous and the evidence to sustain it wanting, the finely wrought argumentative structure built upon it is of but little value.

In the speech made by the honorable Senator from Missouri there is another point to which I desire to call attention, and I quote his own words. In reply to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] he said:

> The Senator must also be aware that the remedy vaunted by him as a certain cure has been amply applied. It has been applied in a greater measure than it was done in England in most, if not all—yes, I say in all—the instances that he quoted. The Secretary of the Treasury in September bought bonds to the amount of fourteen millions, and threw that amount of currency into the market. Since then the forty-four million reserve has been drawn upon to the amount of twenty-five millions, and those twenty-five millions have again been added to the currency. But not only that, all the other reserves of the Treasury Department have been exhausted, and that currency also is in the hands of the people.

Here he asserts that since the panic commenced about forty millions or more of money has been thrown into circulation. Now the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] tells us, if I correctly understood him, that money is plenty in New York and can be easily and reasonably obtained on good paper. It would seem, then, by putting these two statements together, that the cure the Senator from Indiana proposed has not failed in this case, so far as it has been applied, and that here the theory for which we are now contending is confirmed by the statements from the mouths of its opponents. Apply the medicine to the whole body of the patient, and we shall have a complete cure; but suppose this remedy so far had not been applied, what would be our present condition? Would our country not have been bankrupt?

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] in his attempt to show that the amount of currency is sufficient to meet the demands of trade, says that the amount per capita in 1860 was $14.50, while the amount now is about $19. Now let us use his own figures by the correct test and see what the result will be. By reference to the census reports, we find that the amount of real and personal property was about $521 per capita in 1860, and $791 in 1870. If $521 of property in 1860 required $14.50 of currency, $791 at the same ratio would require $22, or a total circulation of over $840,000,000. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion as to the basis upon which to arrive at the amount necessary to meet the present demands, as it confirms the position we have assumed, and refutes his own argument on this point. Although the amount of currency per head has been increased 28 per cent., yet it has not kept pace with the increase of property, which has advanced about 52 per cent. per head. According to the ratio that the Senator himself fixes, it would require $840,000,000 of currency to perform the office that was performed by the currency of the country in 1860.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator will allow me, does he mean to say that I laid down the idea that the circulation of a country must increase in the same ratio that the value of its property increases?

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. The Senator said that in 1860 the currency of the country amounted to $14.50 per capita, and now it is $19; and he argued from that that there was enough of currency in the country.

Mr. SCHURZ. If that principle were true, that the circulation necessary for the transaction of business in a country must increase at the same rate as the value of property increases in that same country, then I should think it would be very difficult to get together currency enough to transact the business of England at the present time.

Mr. LOGAN. It must have some relation to business, and it depends largely upon credits, confidence, extent of country, &c.; and the illustration of the Senator making it relative to population or business is as good a one as any, and therefore I use it for my purpose in this argument. It is not my fault if the Senator produces figures here that do not carry out his theory. I am only showing what he said. He, by way of a per capita argument, said that $14.50 per head in 1860 was the relation of the money to the people of the country. Then I say when you take money in its relation to the property which it represents, and not the people, it proves that you must have $22 a head, per capita. Now, if you make the ratio according to the property that the money represents, the Senator has supplied me with an argument that otherwise I might not have thought of.

One more allusion to the same speech and I will be through with it. The Senator, in alluding to the bearing of this question on the West, remarks as follows:

> But there is another aspect of the case. The economic interest of the West is mainly agricultural. The western people are, by overwhelming preponderance, a farming population. Their whole prosperity depends upon the successful and profitable cultivation of the soil. If it is true that the farmer, for all the necessaries he had to buy, had to pay prices blown up by our irredeemable and redundant currency, even far beyond the point to which the tariff alone would have driven them, while the prices of almost all the staples he had to sell were regulated by a foreign market, untouched by home inflation, governed by a specie measure of value, and exposed to the free competition of the world—if that is true, and I trust nobody will deny it, must it not be equally true that the farming interest, and through it the whole western country, will not only not be injured, but be vastly benefited, by a resumption of specie payments, which will greatly reduce the prices at which the farmer has to buy his necessaries, while not reducing, but greatly increasing, the purchasing power of the crops he produces and has to sell? And will not this immense advantage in fact vastly overbalance any possible amount of loss which might be suffered in consequence of temporary indebtedness, and which by prudent management may be made very small?

I must confess that I am somewhat astonished to hear such a remark as this fall from the honorable Senator. Does he not know full well that the rule he applies to the imported articles works in principle just the same with exported articles? Let me illustrate this, and I think I can make it plain. Suppose wheat at a gold standard is one dollar per bushel in New York, and that coffee at the same standard and same place is ten cents per pound, then one bushel of wheat will purchase ten pounds of coffee. Suppose currency by inflation, as the gentleman terms it and according to his theory, should depreciate until one dollar in gold equaled one dollar and a half in paper. Then one pound of coffee would cost fifteen cents in currency at New York. Now let me ask, what would prevent the farmer from still getting his one dollar in gold for his wheat, or a dollar and a half, its equivalent, in paper? And would not this still buy the ten pounds of coffee? What becomes, then, of the Senator's argument on this point?

Mr. President, the farmers in Illinois are too clear-headed, and I believe they are also in Missouri, to part with their wheat and other products on any such theory as his. They can count the per cent. pro and con just as well as you and I; and if the honorable Senator is no better financier in such matters in practice than he is in theory, I doubt very much whether any of them would appoint him as their agent.

You may theorize and argue to the farmers until you are hoarse, yet you will fail to get them to prefer low prices to high ones for their products. They know that one bushel of wheat at $1.25 in currency will buy one acre of Government land, while it takes two and a half bushels, at fifty cents, to purchase it, though it be in gold. They know that a dollar in paper, if legal-tender, will pay a dollar of taxes as well as a dollar in gold. They know well enough by experience that if you run down prices by lessening the currency to bring it to a par with gold, there will be no corresponding decrease in taxes, and salaries of county, State, and municipal officers, nor in the debts they owe. They know also that it will take as many dollars in gold, for every one of which they have to give their two bushels of wheat, to pay their county, city, town, and State debts, as it will dollars of paper, of which they can get $1.50 for each bushel of wheat. They know full well that, when their produce is thus reduced, their lands will be sold for their debts, and bought by those who held the money when it was thus transformed into gold. Sir, the farmers of the West are not blind to these facts, and all the fine-spun theories of contractionists will fail to delude them into this idea. They may have been led by their county and State officers to indorse and enter into schemes which involved them more than was prudent, because money was somewhat plentiful, but they have grown prosperous under it, and have opened the way to market for their products; and the result of the attempt to return to specie payment, except by natural course of trade, would be to give all their hard earnings into the hands of railroad and other corporations, as well as money-lenders, to whom they may be indebted.

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio, if I understood them rightly, both took the position and argued that reducing the currency until it reaches the specie standard will reduce the rate of interest. This, Mr. President, appears to me to be a very singular argument. It is equivalent to saying that if you reduce the quantity of wheat and flour in market the price will fall; that when the supply of cotton is reduced to a minimum the price will be a minimum, and all cotton goods will reach the lowest rate. In other words, it is equivalent to saying that there is no relation between the price and supply or demand, or, if there is, that it is contrary to what has always been accepted as true heretofore. I believe that it has always been accepted as a true theory, before the present debate began, that the relation of the supply to the demand governed the rate of interest where not arbitrarily fixed by law. And in this matter it seems to me that the contractionists are, unconsciously of course, blowing both hot and cold. For if, as most of them argue, by withdrawing part of the currency the want of more money will cause gold to flow in, it certainly must be because it brings a better price than previous to the withdrawal.

Now, gentlemen, it is hardly fair to claim both sides of this question; both conclusions cannot be true. If decreasing the currency causes gold to flow in, it must be because it finds a better market and brings a better price than before, and, as a matter of course, a higher rate of interest. Why did the rate of interest run up so high in eastern cities during the panic, if it was not because of the amount withdrawn from circulation. Why is the rate easier now in New York, as the Senator from Ohio says, and 2 per cent. a month in other places? Simply because money has been flowing into New York, and withdrawn from the others. It is because there is more money, and not because there is less, according to the argument of the Senator himself. He says the rate of interest is lower in New York now than it was a short time ago. Why? Not because your money is reduced, but because your money is increased; because the supply has reached the demand in that city. In the same way you may apply the rule to anything else. In New York interest is low; in other places it is high. In the West, in some places, our people are paying 2 per cent. a month interest, simply because money has been flowing into New York and withdrawn from other places.

This, sir, is too plain a proposition for all the rhetoric of the Senator from Missouri or the earnest eloquence of the Senator from Ohio to overcome. Local influences and other temporary causes may affect the rate of interest for a time; but, as a general rule, which is applicable everywhere, the rate of interest will be at a healthy normal standard when the supply of currency is properly proportioned to the demands of trade; when the supply is greatly below the demand the rate must be high, and when the supply is greatly in excess of the demand the rate will be high on account of speculation; but this is not our case at the present. Therefore it is this proper supply that we want, which, basing our calculation on the figures furnished by the Senator from Missouri, is between eight hundred and eight hundred and fifty million dollars, which is the supply that should be in active circulation.

Before closing, I desire to present other statistics which I think should assist us in arriving at a proper conclusion on this subject, and I will begin by calling attention to a statement made a few days ago by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and I will quote his language. When I say that I appeal to statistics, I want to do it with this understanding before the Senate, that I do not believe there is a man in this Senate, with all his genius and power, who can get a correct statement as to the circulation in England outside of the bank circulation. I searched and delved in every book in reference to it, and I could not find anything that is certainly reliable. But we can approximate to it, and that is all we can do. The statistics that I will produce are as near correct as any that can be produced, and I will give the authorities upon which I base my statement. I have them here. In a colloquy between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] this was said:

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to correct, now while the Senator is upon this point, the statement I see in the debate made yesterday by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] It is true that France, before the Germanic war, had $700,000,000 of currency distributed among the people.

Mr. MORTON. Of coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. Gold and silver—mostly silver. He stated also that now it had the same gold in circulation, and $600,000,000 of paper money. It has about $700,000,000 of paper money—that is 3,500,000,000 francs; but it has very little silver and gold. Nearly all the specie in France has gone to Germany to pay the expenses of the war and the large, enormous levy put upon France by the German government.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senator will allow me I will call his attention to the fact that the premium on the currency in France is but one-half of 1 per cent. It seems to me that controverts the position taken by the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall endeavor to show in a day or two that we can learn a great deal from France. France maintains now, at or about the par of gold, $700,000,000 of paper money; and if we do precisely what France is doing to-day, give to our paper money the qualities that are conferred by law in France, we shall do what I propose to do at least toward the resumption of specie payments.

This was the statement of the Senator who is chairman of the Finance Committee a few days ago, in reply to the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Michigan, that France had seven hundred millions of paper currency in circulation, and had very little silver or gold. Now, let us see whether it is so or not. In answer to this I will quote a statement of an eminent French authority on matters of finance and currency, as given by an advocate of specie payments in the North American Review, January, 1874, and I have the authority from which he quotes here before me in a French magazine—Revue des Deux Mondes, November 1, 1873. I have compared it. Any gentleman who reads French may make a comparison. I admit that I do not read it very well, but I can read it sufficiently to understand it, and I have had it compared by scholars who do translate perfectly.

Mr. SCHURZ. I have seen the article.

Mr. LOGAN. You have seen the article. Very well; I suppose you have read it, then. M. Bonnet, however, is said to be good authority on the currency question.

M. Victor Bonnet, an eminent French authority in matters of currency and finance, in an article in the Revue des Deux Mondes for November 1, states the amount of silver coin in circulation in France and in its mint to be $300,000,000, while the coinage of this metal is going on at the rate of $25,000,000 annually. The gold coin in circulation he estimates at $800,000,000, making a total metallic currency for that country of $1,100,000,000; and that, too, after the payment of the German indemnity of $1,000,000,000. The bids for the loan of $750,000,000 brought out in France in the summer of 1872 equaled $8,000,000,000, a sum very nearly four times the amount of the public debt of the United States. These figures should qualify our conceit a little when our country and its resources are the theme.

M. Bonnet also states that the silver coin in circulation in Germany equals $480,000,000, while its recent gold coinage (largely drawn from the French payment) amounts to $296,000,000. In England the amount of coin in circulation outside of the Bank of England, which holds $100,000,000, is estimated at $500,000,000. We shall need at least an equal sum. The amount now held in this country, in all hands, cannot exceed $150,000,000. We must accumulate, therefore, an additional sum of $350,000,000 before we can safely attempt a final resumption.—North American Review, January, 1874, page 138.

The gold in circulation in France he estimates at $800,000,000——

Mr. MORTON. What is the date of that estimate?

Mr. LOGAN. The 1st of November, 1873.

Making a total metallic currency for the country of $1,100,000,000.

In France in the summer of 1872 the bids offered for the loan to France amounted to $8,000,000,000, a sum nearly four times the public debt of the United States. I will show before I am through, by authority that you will not dispute, that you, gentlemen, are mistaken. He says that $300,000,000 of silver was in France and $800,000,000 of gold in November, 1873. "O, but," say some, "they paid the indemnity out of that." No, sir; this authority states expressly that this estimate is since the indemnity was paid, making $1,100,000,000 of specie in France and $700,000,000 of currency, according to the statement by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in which, I think, the Senator was in excess by $100,000,000. And yet he (the Senator from Ohio) says there was very little silver or gold in France.

I am not done with this authority. He further gives the amount in Germany and in England.

Now, to show you that there cannot be very much of a mistake, I will quote from another authority; and I read from an article published by Henry Carey Baird, based on the statistics of the French writers in reference to currency. Here is his statement:

In France you will find a country with probably more nearly an adequate supply of currency than any other in the world—$600,000,000 of Bank of France notes and not less than $700,000,000 of gold and silver coin. The private deposits in the bank are now but $45,000,000, and the business of the country is largely done for cash.

Mr. Carey comes within $100,000,000 of the Senator from Ohio. He says France has $600,000,000 in bank-note circulation, and that it has $700,000,000 of gold and silver. That would be $1,300,000,000 at the lowest estimate, putting the estimate of bank-notes at $100,000,000 less than the Senator from Ohio estimated the currency of France.

Mr. MORTON. And that without silver.

Mr. LOGAN. No; "metallic currency." "And the private deposits in the bank are $45,000,000 besides."

Now, to show you——

Mr. SCHURZ. The amount of bank currency in France at the present moment I can give some reliable information upon, because I have seen the papers that arrived here by the last mail. It is 2,900,000,000 francs—not quite $600,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I am sorry the rest of us did not get the last mail from France; but even this is about the amount given by Mr. Baird; but I do not want to quote from any poor authorities; I do not intend to quote from myself or my knowledge; but I know the Senator from Ohio will allow me to quote from him. The Senator from Ohio intimated very clearly—and he not only intimated but he said—that the reason the gold and silver was in small amount in France was because it was taken out of France to pay the indemnity.

Mr. SHERMAN. A portion of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, we will look at the authority of Thiers. I will read from his speech of November 11, 1872. He said that "the whole available capital of the commercial world has been offered to France." Speaking of this indemnity—

Seventeen hundred and fifty million francs have been realized in three months. The government commenced operations with 1,400,000,000 francs to 1,500,000,000 francs in bills of all countries on Germany and Prussia.

France commenced with that much, mark you, of bills of Prussia already in her hands when she commenced paying the indemnity.

Prussia had already received 800,000,000 francs, and will receive 200,000,000 francs more in December. The government would have 600,000,000 francs remaining in bills for the next payment.

Bills of Prussia! Speaking of the position of the Bank of France, M. Thiers said:

The bank has 800,000,000 francs in gold and silver in hand, and 44,000,000 francs of bar gold and 50,000,000 francs in gold and silver belonging to the state.

My friend from Ohio says that there is very little gold and silver in France; but, according to M. Thiers, then President of France, they had 800,000,000 francs in gold coin, and 44,000,000 francs in bar gold, and 50,000,000 francs belonging to the state in the Bank of France, after paying this indemnity to Germany—in the bank, not in circulation among the people, but as a reserve there, showing that that gold was held in the bank besides the gold and silver that were out among the people in circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator, if he wishes to be correct, exactly to state how much of the indemnity had been paid at that time. The indemnity was paid by installments.

Mr. LOGAN. M. Thiers says 800,000,000 francs, and that 1,750,000,000 francs had been received by France for the payment to Prussia.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was only one portion of the indemnity.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but I am showing that at the time the first payment was made they still had that reserve; and then he says beside this—the Senator did not hear me—that they have 600,000,000 francs of bills already in hand against Prussia to pay the next portion, besides this gold in the bank.

Mr. SHERMAN. No doubt that is true.

Mr. LOGAN. That shows that the payment to Germany did not drain the gold out of France, but it was paid by bills on Prussia, the first 800,000,000 francs, and then the 600,000,000 francs which were to be paid next they already had in hand. I think it is good authority. I take it from the American Annual Encyclopædia for 1872. And yet gentlemen say there is no specie money there. Why, sir, I tell you statistics are very curious things in this Senate Chamber. Some would have it go to the country that there is no gold or silver in France; and that is put forth by the highest authority here in the Senate, when the very contrary is proven by all the authorities that are on the subject.

Now, sir, I will go further with this to show the condition of things as near as I can; and I do not know how near I shall come to doing it, but I will do my best. The Senator from Ohio would take France as his model. We see that France has a specie circulation of $1,100,000,000. If we add to this the paper circulation of $700,000,000, as stated by himself, which is $100,000,000 more than Mr. Baird gives it, it makes eighteen hundred millions of money in France. But take Mr. Baird's statement, which is $100,000,000 less, and his gold and silver is $400,000,000 less than Mr. Bonnet makes it. Then, according to the smallest statements that you have from the statistical statements, France has $1,300,000,000 circulation of paper and gold and silver coin; and the highest estimate makes it $1,800,000,000.

Now the population of France according to the census of 1872* was 36,102,921; therefore, according to these estimates, the circulation was fifty dollars per capita, or a little over two and a half times that of the United States, according to Mr. Bonnet. But for fear these figures, although from the highest authority accessible, would be disputed, I have given an estimate from the other authority, Mr. Baird, which I have just read. This gives a total of $1,300,000,000, although estimating the paper $100,000,000 less than the Senator from Ohio; showing a circulation of over thirty-six dollars per capita in France.

I am inclined from these figures to think the Senator has made an unfortunate reference for his theory; for here we see that the very country which he selects as his model has, even at the lowest estimate, 80 per cent. more money per head than we are now asking as our extreme limit.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would ask the Senator in that connection to call the attention of the country to the fact, which is corroborative of the position he takes in regard to the relative amount of coin to currency, that gold in France is but one-half of 1 per cent. premium under suspension.

Mr. MORTON. And in general circulation to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

I will, in reference to the same country, make a comparison of her imports of the precious metals with her exports. For the purpose of showing that those gentlemen who talk about the small amount of hard currency in France must be mistaken, I will appeal again to the same authority, which cannot be disputed. I refer to the American Encyclopædia, 1872, page 316. It shows that the imports of the precious metals into France from 1865 to 1868 averaged per annum $129,400,000 in gold, in 1868 and 1869 they averaged $156,200,000, and her exports averaged fifty-two millions up to 1868 and seventy-four millions in 1869. This shows an increase in these five years to her receipts, in gold, of $387,800,000, increasing at that ratio, from this country and others producing gold. And yet with this vast amount of money on hand we find that France, with all its accumulated wealth, with all this money, in 1872 negotiated a loan from England for $800,000,000. In reference to the loan you may consult the American Encyclopædia for 1873, page 361.

Now, let us see how the case stands in Great Britain, in regard to which so much has been said. In December, 1872, the amount of bullion and notes of the Bank of England stood as follows, (estimating the pound at five dollars:) bullion, $112,259,000; notes in circulation, $122,053,000; notes reserved, $65,206,000. Now add to this the $500,000,000 coin in circulation outside of the bank, and we have a total of $799,518,000; or, in round numbers, $800,000,000 of money, without including the paper circulation of any other of the banks of England, Ireland, or Scotland. The population of the United Kingdom, according to the British census of April, 1871, was 31,817,108. Therefore, the amount of currency per capita is a little over twenty-five dollars, or 10 per cent. more than our highest demand.

Now, since gentlemen appeal to these countries as patterns of good finance, I ask whether they are willing to follow the patterns?

But before leaving English finance, I wish to show that even there money rates are liable to considerable fluctuations.

The numerous negotiations and enterprises of the year were accompanied by frequent fluctuations and panics, whereby the rates of interest were at one time over 7 per cent., while at other periods the rate was reduced to 3 per cent.—American Encyclopædia, 1873, page 361.

This tells its own story, and needs no comment.

By reference to a table now before me, I see that between September 26 and October 10, 1872, $17,847,000 were drawn from the bank reserves, showing large fluctuations, even in times of a healthy financial condition.

Now, if the Senate will pardon me, I will give some figures showing the respective amounts of money in the United States, Germany, France, and England, or rather the approximate amount, because I do not believe any man can give the exact amount. I do not believe the gentlemen who deal in such figures can give them more accurately than I can myself.

United States.

(Bagehot's Lombard Street; North American Review, January, 1874; Revue des Deux Mondes, November 1, 1873.)

Mr. SCHURZ. How does the Senator make out that France has a circulation of $31.56 per head.

Mr. LOGAN. I make up the amount I give from the estimates from these books before me, (North American Review, January, 1874, and Bagehot's Lombard Street,) which are held to be good authority, and from the estimate given by this French writer, (Bonnet, Revue des Deux Mondes, November 1, 1873.) Take the Bank of France; by dividing the estimates between the different ones as best I can, and they have $1,650,000,000 in that country. Take it at the least estimate, and it gives $34.62 per head.

These figures show the incorrectness of the statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee the other day, that we have more money per head and per amount of business in this country than any other country in the world. The figures of the best financial writers in this and foreign countries contradict that statement; and with these writers the Senator may settle the question. I only appeal to them for my facts, and my facts coming from them controvert the assertion made by the Senator, that we have more money here than they have in any other country in the world. Sir, we have less money; we have always had less money; and that is the trouble in our country to-day, and has been the trouble, and will be the trouble, until we make some decided change in our system.

* The second estimate of coin brings it down nearly to that of England, and below Germany, and therefore cannot be far wrong; it is the lowest to be found.

Now, Mr. President, suppose you take the eight or nearly nine hundred millions of money in England to her thirty-one million of population, circumscribed in her limits, and living almost clustered as if in a city, and with one great city containing almost one-tenth of the population of the entire kingdom, with every sort of facility for business. The result is that they certainly can do business on a much cheaper scale, and much easier, than it can be done in a wide-spread country like this, where we are so far separated in our business relations, our banks, and our great moneyed centers.

Some Senators in their argument said that the Bank of England notes were good everywhere in the civilized world. I agree to that. Hence they say we desire our notes shall be made equally good. How will you make them equally good? Sir, if they were worth the par of gold to-day they would not be as good. Why? Because the settling of balances would not be done in this country. Our notes would not flow back to us as the Bank of England notes do to London. London is the grand exchange for the civilized nations of the earth. It is the great settling place of balances. Hence the notes of the Bank of England, no matter where scattered on the face of the broad earth, seek London, like water seeks its level. Whenever we stand in the same relation to the world as they do we may look forward to this condition of things, and not till then.

Mr. SCHURZ. May I suggest to the Senator that the balance of trade has been usually against England from time immemorial?

Mr. LOGAN. It has, perhaps, usually.

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, sir; always.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator and I do not understand this alike, perhaps. That is the only difference; call it balance of exchange, or whatever you please; London is the great exchange market of the world. I may not be as apt in terms as my friend, but I believe I can equally understand a proposition.

Now, sir, I will say this to the Senator. Perhaps it is a thing he does not know. It will be strange if I shall give him some information. You talk about the notes of England. When you say "the Bank of England" do you mean just the Bank of England alone, or do you mean the banks of England—that their notes are good all over the world?

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator ought to have addressed that question to the gentleman who introduced "the Bank of England" into this debate. I did not.

Mr. LOGAN. I will address it to him.

Mr. SCHURZ. When I say "the Bank of England" I mean the Bank of England; and when I say "the banks of England" I certainly mean the banks of England.

Mr. LOGAN. That is it; I understand it. [Laughter.] The idea I want to get at I will state. It is a very strange thing to me, but perhaps the financial philosophy of some of these men can solve it—I cannot—that the Bank of England notes are not only good at home but abroad, while the notes of the banks of the balance of the kingdom, that pay gold every day for their bank-notes, are at a discount in London to-day. How is that? Why is that? And yet you say ours can be made par all over the world.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can answer that.

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield; I am seeking information.

Mr. SHERMAN. The banks of Ireland and Scotland are joint-stock banks. Their notes are payable in Bank of England notes. The Bank of England note itself is secured by the securities of the government of Great Britain and by gold and silver. Every Bank of England note represents so much government securities or so much gold and silver bullion. The Bank of England note is nothing but a certificate of the existence of so much gold to be paid to the person who presents it, and therefore it goes all over the world.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood that before, [laughter,] and that is correct so far. But the proposition is this: why other banks of England, Ireland, and Scotland, which redeem in specie, are not good outside of their own localities. If not, how will you make ours good outside of our locality or country? Take the Bank of Dublin, for instance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Bank of Dublin is a joint-stock bank; but it may have been organized differently.

Mr. MORTON. I would suggest to the Senator that that could make no difference, as they redeem their notes in gold.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course, if it is the same basis, it makes no difference. The point is this: the banks of Scotland and the banks of Ireland, whether joint-stock banks or not, are based on gold and pay specie for their notes at their counters; but there is not a note of a bank in Ireland or Scotland to-day but what is at a discount at the counter of the Bank of England. I should like some man to tell me how it is that you expect our money is going to be equal to gold all over the world when the notes of the banks of the kingdom of Great Britain itself are not good at their own counters, except at ¼ per cent., and sometimes 1 and sometimes 1½ per cent. discount. No, sir; it is something more than merely paying gold or silver that makes paper money good all over the world.

Mr. President, there was a point made here the other day by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that I looked upon as a grand point in this discussion; but it was lightly waved off by a mere wave of the hand in a rather majestic and easy style and manner, as though it had no force in it. He said that—

> In England and those countries a bank dotted the country at every five-mile post almost, and there exchanges could be made, and people were not troubled. The differences between banks could be settled, the balances could be settled every day, and there was no difficulty about exchanges and discounts with the people; they were so convenient.

I take that as a grand fact and a good point. But yet in that country, as I said, confined in its limits, narrow in compass, with a bank at every corner and every place to do the business of the community, with almost a tenth of the population of the kingdom together in one city, it has more money per capita than we have to-day in this country that stretches its thousands of miles from ocean to ocean and from lakes to gulf, and is spanned by railroads only in certain portions, when travel in other parts is slow, by stage-coach or by steamboat. I do say that to transact the business between banks, between cities, between commercial communities and between business men, it requires a greater volume of currency for a sparsely settled country and a wide-spread country than it does where the people are clustered closely together.

I do not see how people can misunderstand that. I do not see how an argument of that kind made by a Senator is viewed as though it amounted to nothing. It does amount to something; and it amounts to a great deal. I have seen the effect of it myself. In Chicago, at the time of the panic, when commercial paper would not do, when you had to wait for the express to come from New York to Chicago to bring currency to keep a bank from going under, the hour when the clearing-house would close was noticed just as the breathing of a dying man. Suppose when you stretch further out, and you have to depend upon a great commercial center in a crisis like this, five minutes sometimes destroys a bank or a banking institution if it cannot pass the clearing-house at the very moment.

And yet men will argue that this makes no difference. It does make a difference. The currency of a country wide-spread like this should be so far beyond that which is in reserve and held back as to transact the business of the country in connection with the commercial paper and credit of all kinds used, and should be at least distributed in the different parts of the country so as to relieve the wants and necessities of trade.

From these facts, Mr. President, which I have obtained from the best sources at hand, the following conclusions are clear to my mind:

First. That assuming gold as a standard of value gives no assurance that the value affixed to the unit will remain fixed and permanent; because, possessing no power of contraction or expansion, it cannot adapt itself to the increasing or decreasing wants of commerce; therefore this relation can only be established by change in price of the products of trade.

Second. That there is a certain relation between the volume of currency to the amount of commerce and business which cannot be reduced without financial disaster.

Third. That the amount of gold in this country, which at the highest estimate does not exceed $150,000,000, is wholly inadequate to afford a sufficient medium of exchange.

Fourth. That an attempt to resume specie payment must inevitably bring financial ruin upon the country.

Fifth. That the examples afforded by other enlightened nations, and the experience of our own country, make it clear that the volume of currency in circulation in this country sufficient to meet the wants of trade, should be at least $800,000,000.

And therefore I give it as my firm conviction, after a somewhat careful study of the subject, that there should be a moderate increase in the amount of currency, and that it is the duty of Congress to inaugurate some measure looking to this end.

I shall therefore vote for the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] in place of the resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

In order to reach this end, which I think the country needs, I would, if it were left to me, (not being a member of the Committee on Finance, of course it is not in my power to have anything to do with the bringing in of bills,) increase the circulation of the national banks by a distribution to the portions of the country that are to-day deprived of it and by that deprivation are imposed on improperly. I would first increase it to the volume I mention, $800,000,000, make the national-bank currency and the greenbacks assimilate in amount, $400,000,000 of each, inasmuch as national-bank notes are redeemable by United States notes, which will require a very small issue, and give the surplus to the portions of the country that to-day have not the amount which they ought to have according to the equality that ought to exist between the business classes of the different sections of the country. In addition to that I would, as soon as practicable—and I believe it can be done very soon—introduce the system of free banking. I would so regulate it and so guard it that every man holding a bill would be just as well secured as he is to-day holding the bill of a national bank or a United States currency note. I would place it upon a proper and safe basis, the bonds of the Government, and then I would let the necessities of trade and commerce regulate the standard of the currency of the country.

Mr. President, these are the conclusions at which I have arrived. Although I confess my inability to do justice to the subject, yet I have never, in the course of my life, more thoroughly devoted myself to the consideration of any question than I have during the past two weeks, when not engaged in the Senate, to the subject now before the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter of the Adjutant-General in regard to the appropriations for collecting and paying bounties to colored soldiers; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 19, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing. The morning hour begins at three minutes after twelve o'clock.

JOHN B. SLACK.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1233) for the relief of John B. Slack, late an acting third assistant engineer of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

NANCY S. PRINCE.

Mr. BURLEIGH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1234) granting a pension to Nancy S. Prince; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES H. BUGBEE.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1235) granting a pension to Charles H. Bugbee, late a private in Company A, Third Regiment Vermont Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

D. D. WEAD.

Mr. HENDEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1236) to reimburse D. D. Wead, postmaster at Sheldon, Vermont, for stamps and money stolen from him December 31, 1873; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SURVIVORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. STARKWEATHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1237) to amend "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the war of 1812 and to their widows," approved February 14, 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be, and is hereby, instructed to ascertain if the amounts granted by Congress to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Springfield, Missouri, to the Pacific Ocean, are forfeited, and if any legislation be necessary by Congress to restore such lands to pre-emption and homestead entry.

FINANCE.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the preamble and resolutions which I send to the desk be adopted:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by reason of the present monetary stringency and the insufficiency in the amount of circulating medium, the industries and commercial affairs of the country have been greatly depressed; and whereas by reason of said stringency the revenues of the Government have been largely diminished, in consequence whereof Congress has been asked to increase taxation to the amount of $42,000,000; and whereas until the recent panic the revenues were ample to meet the current expenses of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That instead of levying additional taxes the true policy lies in the enactment of such a law or laws as will relieve such stringency and supply the means necessary to the business wants of the country, by increasing the circulating medium, thereby reviving business, increasing revenues, and thus avoiding the necessity of increasing the present rates of taxation or duties, or the imposition of additional taxes or duties.

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, instructed to prepare and report to the House, without delay, a bill for the purpose in the first resolution expressed, and that said committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask for the yeas and nays on that resolution.

Mr. SPEER. Is it in order to raise the question of consideration on that resolution?

The SPEAKER. That is a question raised under the rules, and this is a proposition to suspend the rules—that and all others.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to make a suggestion, not to debate the resolution. I wish to say to the House that this matter is now before two of their committees, and last Saturday there was a very interesting debate in the House on the same subject. I would suggest to my friend that, instead of having a vote taken on the resolution at this time, it be introduced and set down for debate at some time, so that the views of all the different members of the House can be brought out in regard to this question, and so that at a very early day both the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Banking and Currency will have the benefit of the expression of the opinions of the members of this House after discussion. The Committee on Ways and Means had proposed to report something on this question that would be subject of debate cognate to this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. The subject is now before the House in a tangible form, and, as I understand, the motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Banking and Currency have been sitting, even during the sessions of the House, and have been listening to the opinions of some of the most eminent gentlemen from all parts of the country on this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the motion is not debatable.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think my colleague should not ask a vote on this resolution without its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means, which now has the subject before it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I only desire to say that this question is now exciting a great deal of public attention in the country, and I have drawn up these resolutions for the express purpose of testing the sense of this House, and letting the country know whether or not we are to have an increase of currency. I must therefore insist on a vote on my resolution.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. All amendments are in the nature of debate, which is objected to. It is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] who prevents the gentleman from New York from being heard, and not the Chair.

Mr. COX. I am not proposing to debate. I simply wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order to a motion to suspend the rules, and under the parliamentary law the reading of an amendment would be in the nature of debate.

Mr. COX. Well; I want to get a vote on my amendment when the gentleman from Indiana gets through.

The SPEAKER. Ah! that is another question altogether.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask if we cannot have a division of this question?

The SPEAKER. Not on a motion to suspend the rules. The motion is to suspend all the rules, including the one under which the gentleman would have a right to ask a division.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 98, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burrows, Roderick R. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, and Woodford—53.

So, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. WHITTHORNE. My colleague, Mr. ATKINS, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. CLYMER. My colleague, Mr. MAGEE, is unexpectedly and necessarily absent.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. LAWSON, my colleague, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MILLIKEN. My colleague, Mr. STANDEFORD, is necessarily absent.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague, Mr. E. R. HOAR, is absent on necessary business; if here, he would vote "no."

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. My colleague, Mr. TREMAIN, is confined to his room by ill health.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES.

The SPEAKER. Under a rule adopted by the House, it is the duty of the Chair to indicate the Official Reporters of the House. The Chair simply confirms the reporters already existing. They are as follows: John J. McElhone, William Hincks, William Blair Lord, David Wolfe Brown, and James K. Edwards.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The SPEAKER. The House also directed the Speaker to appoint a Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of Justice. The Chair appoints the following committee: Mr. JAMES B. SENER of Virginia, Mr. RICHARD C. PARSONS of Ohio, Mr. JOHN M. S. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts, Mr. R. MILTON SPEER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. MILTON J. DURHAM of Kentucky.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the attention of the House for one moment. The Clerk will read the rule of the House in reference to admissions to the floor. It has very often been read in the hearing of the House; the Chair desires that it may be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

No person, except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments the President's private secretary, foreign ministers, the governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, and such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress, shall be admitted within the hall of the House of Representatives or any of the rooms upon the same floor or opening into the same: Provided, That ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and shall so register themselves, may also be admitted within the hall of the House; and no person except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House. [Rule 134.] The Doorkeeper shall execute strictly the foregoing rule. [Rule 27.]

The SPEAKER. The impression prevails generally among members that the Speaker is charged with the right of abolishing that rule. He has no such right whatever. Members must all be aware that great disorder exists in the House to-day; and it is because there are thirty or forty gentlemen admitted to the floor who have no right here whatever. The Chair now gives notice to the members of this House that if any one of them shall ask him to permit his friends, be they two or a dozen, to be admitted to the floor of the House, the Chair will give his consent. The Chair throws the responsibility wholly upon the members of the House. He will in no event resist any applications made for the admission of persons to the floor of the House. The Chair will state, however, that the reserved gallery is at the disposal of gentlemen, and from it they can see better and hear better than they can from the floor of the House. Disorder in the House can be checked if members, instead of bringing the members of their Legislature or any of their State officers who may happen to be in the city on the floor of the House, will permit them to take seats in the gallery.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Speaker decide that he can suspend that rule?

The SPEAKER. Not in the slightest degree; but he merely gives his consent, greatly against his judgment, that members may bring upon the floor of the House whoever they please.

Mr. DAWES. What is the effect of that consent on the Doorkeeper?

The SPEAKER. The rule says "the Doorkeeper shall execute strictly the foregoing rule." He is charged with the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the Speaker consent that the Doorkeeper shall waive his responsibility under that rule?

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper has always been under the rules of the House. But members come to the Speaker, instead of to the Doorkeeper, for permission to bring their friends upon the floor of the House. The Chair desires to say publicly that he has no control whatever over that matter. But since members are themselves willing to contribute to the non-enforcement of that rule, the Chair will interpose no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Chair does not hold that the Doorkeeper is at liberty to let in anybody?

The SPEAKER. It is the opinion of the Chair that no person, except those included under that rule, should under any circumstances come upon the floor of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. The Chair means to remit every member of the House to his own responsibility.

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair is concerned.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the Committee on Appropriations have permission to hold sessions during the sittings of the House.

No objection was made; and leave was granted accordingly.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution for consideration at this time, in order to obtain some information from one of the Departments:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to inform this House what is the number of pension agents appointed under existing laws, their residences, and the amount of compensation received by each since the 4th day of March, 1869.

No objection being made, the resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS FOR SOLDIERS OF THE SEMINOLE WAR.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Seminole war of 1818, and report by bill or otherwise.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to suspend the rules and adopt a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SYPHER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer a resolution which will cause no debate.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I will yield if it does not lead to debate.

EXPENDITURES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SYPHER. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be directed to inquire and report to this House, by bill or otherwise, first, whether the expenditures in the Treasury Department are justified by law; secondly, whether claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by said Department are supported by sufficient vouchers establishing their justness, both in character and amount; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; thirdly, whether any and what provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys, and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character and extravagant in their amount; fourthly, whether any and what retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of said Department without detriment to the public service, whether any and what abuses exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters and others, and what provisions are necessary to add to the economy of the Department and accountability of its officers; fifthly, whether any officers belonging to said Department have become useless or unnecessary, and whether it is expedient to modify or abolish the same; also, to examine into the pay and emoluments of said officers, and report such reduction or increase as a just economy and the public service may require.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would suggest to the House that this subject is already being examined by a committee under the order of the House.

Mr. SYPHER. It is a matter, under the rules, for the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object.

Subsequently the objection was withdrawn, and the resolution was adopted.

FREE PASSAGE OF GOVERNMENT MAIL MATTER.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to suspend the rules in order to allow me to introduce, and the House to pass, a bill providing for the free passage through the mails of matter printed by order of the Government of the United States.

The bill was read. It provides that all matter printed by order of the Government of the United States, bearing the official signature of a member of either House of Congress, shall pass through the mails free of charge, from the date of the passage of the act until the 1st day of July, 1874.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I desire to say that there is a great deal of printed matter now around this Capitol and in the Departments, and a great many public documents——

Several MEMBERS objected to debate.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Then I insist on my motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not in order to say that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads——

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I object to debate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I would like to ask unanimous consent for my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] to report a bill from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads instead of the bill I offer.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to that.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 98, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Ashe, Beck, Bell, Blount, Bright, Buckner, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cessna, Clymer, Comingo, Corwin, Crutchfield, Davis, De Witt, Donnan, Eldredge, Giddings, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, Havens, Hays, Hereford, Herndon, Houghton, Howe, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Lofland, Marshall, Maynard, Milliken, Mills, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Negley, Nesmith, Nunn, O'Brien, Isaac C. Parker, Perry, James H. Platt, jr., Purman, Rawls, Ray, Read, Robbins, Sener, Sheats, Sloss, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Southard, Speer, Todd, Vance, Wallace, Whitehead, William Williams, Willie, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Averill, Banning, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Berry, Biery, Bland, Bowen, Bradley, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Elliott, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Jewett, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamison, Lamport, Lawrence, Loughridge, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Monroe, Neal, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Rapier, Rice, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Standeford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Thornburgh, Townsend, Tyner, Waddell, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodworth—161.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Atkins, Barber, Barnum, Barry, Amos Clark, jr., Conger, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Duell, Farwell, Fort, Harmer, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hunton, Hynes, Lansing, Lawson, Lewis, Lowe, Luttrell, Magee, McJunkin, McLean, Mitchell, Myers, Niblack, Niles, Orr, Phillips, Pike, Ransier, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Shanks, Sheldon, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stephens, St. John, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Thomas, Tremain, Walls, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley Ephriam K. Wilson, Wood, and Woodford—54.

So, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, (when his name was called,) said: I vote "no," because the bill does not go far enough. [Laughter.]

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Whereas large expenditures of money are annually made at the national capital, not only for the erection and enlargement of public buildings and the care of the public grounds, but also large appropriations have been made to aid in carrying on costly improvements of streets and avenues therein; and whereas the President of the United States has, in his annual message to Congress, recommended further appropriations to aid the completion of said improvements, based, it is believed, in part upon the assumption that the said District of Columbia sustained certain peculiar relations to the General Government, and that certain legal and equitable obligations were assumed by the General Government in consideration of the cession in fee of a large portion of said District to the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report to the House the facts relating to the cession of the District of Columbia by the States of Maryland and Virginia, and the title to the lands embraced in said District deeded to the United States by private citizens; the amount and value of the real property and improvements thereon owned by the United States in said District, and by what title it is held; the extent of legal authority possessed by the General Government over the streets, avenues, and highways in said District, and the legal and equitable relations subsisting between the General Government and said District touching their mutual obligations to share the expense of maintaining in said District a proper local government, and making the national capital a fit residence for the seat of political power for the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that introduced for reference or for action?

The SPEAKER. For reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. RANDALL. It ought to be printed.

Mr. POLAND. It is substantially a resolution of inquiry, merely directing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire in reference to the matter.

Mr. RANDALL. Does it give any right to bring in an additional bill of expenses?

Mr. POLAND. It does not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the resolution.

Mr. POLAND. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] has the floor for that purpose.

THE NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial of the National Board of Trade, and that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorial of the National Board of Trade to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. KILLINGER. I object to the printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There are hundreds of documents of the same character, and if they all be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there will be no end to it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does it require unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to print as a part of the proceedings what has been read?

The SPEAKER. Only the title was read, and that will be printed in the RECORD. Everything transpiring publicly at the Clerk's desk goes, of course, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

IMPROPER USE OF OUR FLAG.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the House be directed to inquire and report whether, under existing laws, the courts of the United States have adequate jurisdiction and authority to prevent and punish the improper use of the flag and national character of the United States on board merchant vessels upon the high seas or in foreign ports; and, furthermore, to inquire and report if any, and if so, what, additional legislation by Congress is expedient or necessary to punish persons who fraudulently obtain, or illegally use, marine documents creating vessels of the United States, and to punish officers of the Government who carelessly or corruptly issue such documents; and also to inquire and report if any, and what, legislation is needed to enable military, naval, or consular officers of this Government to seize on the high seas or in foreign ports vessels illegally assuming an American national character and to send them within a judicial district for adjudication.

Mr. COX. That looks like a reflection upon the Administration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am very sorry.

Mr. COX. I make no objection to its reference, but am opposed to passing on the subject now.

The resolution was adopted.

NATHANIEL M'KAY.

Mr. MELLISH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1381) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COINAGE FOR FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of reporting from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a bill (H. R. No. 1382) authorizing coinage to be executed at the mints of the United States for foreign countries, and passing it at this time.

The bill, which was read, provides that it shall be lawful for coinage to be executed at the mints of the United States for any foreign country applying for the same, according to the legally prescribed standards and devices of such country, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the charge for the same shall be equal to the expenses thereof, including labor and materials and use of machinery, to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; provided the manufacturing of such coin shall not interfere with the required coinage of the United States.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill simply is to continue and extend the present market for our silver production, which has been and still is so rapidly increasing. And in this connection I ask the Clerk to read a portion of a proclamation of the Chinese Empire.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it printed in Chinese? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOOPER. I ask the Clerk to read from a translation.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Translation.]

PROCLAMATION.

Jui, grand secretary of the Weü hau tien, president of the board of war, and governor-general of the Two Kuang Provinces; Chang, vice-president of the board of war, and governor of Kwang Tung; Weü, superintendent of customs for the Canton Provinces, issue a proclamation for general information:

Whereas, there has lately come to Hong-Kong a newly-coined American eagle-dollar, called the "trade dollar," and Sir Brooke Robertson, the British consul, having requested that officers might be appointed to assay it, the viceroy and haikwan thereupon appointed officers to melt it down and assay it, in concert with an officer from the British consulate, when, taking the haikwan tael of pure silver as the standard, an outturn was obtained of fully 89.61; or taels 111.6 of this new eagle dollar are equal to 100 haikwan taels of pure silver. Minutes of the assay were drawn up in proof thereof:

This proclamation, therefore, is for the information of you merchants, traders, soldiers, and people of every district. You must know that the "eagle trade dollar" that has lately come to Hong-Kong has been jointly assayed by officers specially appointed for the purpose, and it can be taken in payment of duties, and come into general circulation. You must not look upon it with suspicion. At the same time rogues, sharpers, and the like are hereby strictly forbidden to fabricate spurious imitations of this new eagle dollar, with a view to their own profit. And should they dare to set this prohibition at defiance, and fabricate false coin, they shall upon discovery most assuredly be arrested and punished. Let every one obey with trembling! Let there be no disobedience!

Mr. HOOPER. It will be seen from what the Clerk has read there is likely to be a great demand, in the Chinese Empire especially, for the "trade dollar," which was authorized by the law passed at the last session of Congress, resulting, of course, in larger consumption of the silver production of our growing Western States and Territories. The bill is a beneficial measure for our commercial and mining interests, and ought to be passed at once.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire whether this bill is recommended by the Director of the Mint?

Mr. HOOPER. It is very strongly recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as well as by the Director of the Mint. I have a letter from Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, and I beg to call the attention of the House to a short extract from it:

I beg to call your attention to the bill authorizing coinage for foreign governments to be executed at the mints of the United States, and to urge early action on the same. It is important that we should find a market for our large and increasing production of silver; and as the bill under consideration will aid very materially in that direction and without detriment to any public or private interest, I hope it will receive early and favorable action by Congress.

The rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

CERTIFICATES FOR GOLD BULLION.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1383) authorizing the issue of certificates for the value of gold bullion deposited at the mints and assay offices of the United States; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOOPER. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that motion. I enter a motion to reconsider; and the bill will only be brought back at some time convenient to the House.

DEPUTY COMMISSIONERS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am directed by the Committee on the Reform of the Civil Service to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1231) to reduce the number of deputy commissioners of internal revenue, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

A bill to reduce the number of deputy commissioners of internal revenue.

Be it enacted, &c., That the office of deputy commissioner of internal revenue, made vacant by the death of General B. J. Sweet, be, and the same is hereby, abolished, and that the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, designate one of the two remaining commissioners as first deputy commissioner, who shall perform the duties and be paid only the salary prescribed for the office of deputy commissioner hereby abolished.

The amendment reported from the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. KELLOGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am also instructed by the Committee on War Claims to report the following resolution, and to ask its passage:

Resolved, That the compensation of the clerk of the Committee on War Claims shall hereafter be the same as now paid to the clerk of the Committee on Claims.

I desire simply to say to the House that the committee were unanimous in reporting this resolution, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall move that the House do now adjourn, unless there be any gentlemen who desire to introduce matters merely for reference.

RELIEF OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1384) amendatory of joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army, approved July 26, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DOCUMENTS FOR COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING.

Mr. KENDALL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, for present consideration. It is a resolution to which I think there will be no objection whatever.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the superintendent of the folding-room be authorized and requested to furnish to the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining full sets of the following reports and documents, to wit: Reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; a compilation of mineral-land laws now in force, together with the instructions and decisions thereon; Mining Statistics and Mining Resources west of the Rocky Mountains; and Reports of Explorations by Messrs. King, Hayden, Powell, and Wheeler; said reports and documents to be kept in the committee-room of said committee for the use of the members thereof.

Mr. SPEER. Are these documents already published?

Mr. KENDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution be adopted. The documents asked for are simply books for reference by our committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are they already printed?

Mr. KENDALL. They are all printed. It is necessary to have a resolution of this sort adopted by the House in order that they may be furnished to the chairman or the clerk of the committee.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Are there any of those documents now in the folding-room, except those belonging to members, and will this resolution involve additional expense?

Mr. KENDALL. I made inquiry as to that, and am informed that this is the proper form for the resolution; and certainly it can do no harm to have those documents furnished to the committee and kept in the committee-room.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have no objection to the resolution. I only wanted to know if the documents are now printed, or if the resolution would involve an expenditure.

Mr. KENDALL. They are all now in print.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. There is already a rule which requires that certain documents shall be furnished to the committees. That rule has been violated, and there is now in the library of the House a vast accumulation of books belonging to committees which have never been in their rooms. Perhaps the gentleman may find the documents he requires for his committee in the library.

Mr. KENDALL. So far I have not been able to obtain these books. The object of the resolution is to enable the committee to obtain those useful reports.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

DELEGATES ON COMMITTEES.

Mr. KENDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That Rule 162 of this House be amended so as to read as follows:

RULE 162. The Speaker shall appoint from among the Delegates from the Territories one additional member of the Committee on the Territories, and four additional members of the Committee on Mines and Mining; and shall appoint the Delegate from the District of Columbia an additional member of the Committee on the District of Columbia; but the said Delegates in their respective committees shall have the same privileges only as in the House.

SHIP-CANAL ACROSS THE ISTHMUS.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the practicability and expediency of the construction of a ship-canal across the American Isthmus, at Darien, Nicaragua, Tehuantepec, or any other route, by the authority or with the aid of the Government of the United States; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object.

SMOKING IN THE PASSAGE-WAYS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be instructed to report such an amendment of Rule 65 as will prohibit smoking in the passage-ways adjoining the Hall of the House.

I will state that the passage-ways surrounding the House are filled with tobacco-smoke, which comes into the Hall and very much corrupts the air of the Hall. I trust that no gentleman will object to the resolution; it does not affect the smoking-rooms proper.

The SPEAKER. The present rule prohibits smoking in the Hall, and the gentleman proposes to pass a resolution instructing the Committee on the Rules to provide for prohibiting it in the rear lobby.

Mr. RANDALL. I think I must object. I do not smoke myself, but I do not want to prevent other gentlemen from having a little comfort.

Mr. DAWES. This resolution would not affect the smoking-rooms of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that of late the rear passage-way of the Hall—and the remark does not apply to members, but to gentlemen who obtain admission there in one way or another—is sometimes so densely filled with smoke that you can hardly pass through it.

Mr. BUNDY. And also the Speaker's room.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes that nobody would do that.

Mr. DAWES. I presume there is no serious objection to the resolution. It does not affect the smoking-rooms proper, but only the passage-ways.

No further objection being made, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 718) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. KILLINGER. I now move that the House adjourn, and shall insist upon that motion.

The question was put, and on a division there were—ayes 72, noes 74.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KILLINGER, and Mr. YOUNG of Georgia, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 73.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 44 members voting therefor.

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bowen, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Cain, Caldwell, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Davis, Dawes, De Witt, Donnan, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Foster, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Jewett, Kasson, Kellogg, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Lawrence, Lofland, Lowe, Luttrell, Lynch, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Milliken, Moore, Neal, Negley, Niblack, Orr, Orth, Packard, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Poland, Potter, Purman, Randall, Rawls, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Shanks, Sloss, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Stanard, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Swann, Taylor, Todd, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—124.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Arthur, Averill, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Cason, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Corwin, Cotton, Crocker, Crooke, Crutchfield, Danford, Dobbins, Dunnell, Elliott, Field, Frye, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Hathorn, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunter, Hyde, Hynes, Kelley, Lamport, Leach, Loughridge, Lowndes, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Mills, Monroe, Morey, Morrison, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Perry, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Rainey, Ransier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Speer, Sprague, Starkweather, Strait, Strawbridge, Thornburgh, Townsend, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, and James Wilson—95.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Barry, Bland, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Conger, Cook, Creamer, Curtis, Darrall, Duell, Farwell, Fort, Freeman, Harmer, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hooper, Howe, Hunton, Kendall, Knapp, Lansing, Lawson, Lewis, Magee, Marshall, McJunkin, McLean, Mitchell, Myers, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, Pelham, Phillips, Pike, Pratt, Rapier, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sheats, Sheldon, Small, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Standeford, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Thomas, Tremain, Waldron, Walls, White, Whitehouse, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, Woodford, and Woodworth—67.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. STANDEFORD, has been called to New York on important business.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of William D. Morrison, for a pension—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 20, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the credentials of Hon. ALLEN G. THURMAN, chosen by the Legislature of Ohio a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant requesting information relative to any unauthorized occupation or invasion of, or encroachment upon, the Indian territory, so called, by individuals, or bodies of men, in violation of treaty stipulations; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the Senate of December 15, 1873, in regard to the results of the abolition of the franking privilege; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that it is in order just at this moment, but hearing that communication led me to remember that the report of the Attorney-General on the subject of the fees and expenses in bankruptcy was read the other day and laid on the table, as I saw by the proceedings. I simply rise to move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of the National Board of Trade, adopted at its recent meeting in Baltimore, Maryland, asking for the modification of the customs laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William Martin, of Oakland County, Michigan, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FENTON presented a memorial of the National Board of Trade, F. Fraley president, indorsing the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York on the subject of collisions at sea; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of the city council and citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, praying the passage of an act granting the use of the abandoned town site of Peru, in that State, as a public park; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the general council of the Indian territory remonstrating against the formation of a territorial government therein; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the general council of the Indian territory, relative to the land-grants made by Congress on the 25th, 26th, and 27th days of July, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Josiah Kirby, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying the extension of his patent on a tool for boring and reaming the bung-holes of barrels; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the amendment of the national banking law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the memorial of the National Board of Trade, composed of commercial representatives from the principal cities of the United States, who, after a full discussion and mature deliberation at their recent convention, held in Baltimore, have adopted as a part of their memorial the following suggestions, which they submit respectfully to the attention of Congress:

First. The National Board of Trade respectfully recommends to Congress that there should be no further issue of irredeemable paper money whatsoever.

Secondly. That, in the opinion of this board, it is the first duty of the Government to provide for the retirement and cancellation of so much of the legal-tender issue as has been taken from the so-called $44,000,000 reserve.

Thirdly. That it is the imperative duty of the Government to restrict its expenditures in every department of the public service to the lowest possible point; and that strict economy be instituted in all appropriations.

Fourthly. Certain amendments of the national banking act.

Fifthly. That the fractional currency now largely in excess of the need of the country should be reduced, and, as far as possible, specie—silver coin—substituted in its place.

And other provisions in regard to our laws relating to fractional currency and silver coinage are suggested.

I am also desired to state that the first three propositions, which are the material ones bearing on the questions now under discussion in the Senate, were adopted by a vote almost approaching unanimity by this convention of the National Board of Trade, representing the principal cities of all parts of the country. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Alabama in favor of the 5 per cent. fund accruing to that State under the act of March 2, 1869, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present thirty-one separate petitions from citizens of Arkansas, California, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and other States, very numerously signed, in which they represent that the present system of carrying newspapers without prepayment of postage is an injustice to all the citizens of the United States except the publishers of newspapers, who are thus made into a favored class, which is contrary to the genius of republican institutions. They therefore pray that the postal code may be so amended that all matter, whether letters, newspapers, printed matter, or merchandise, may be prepaid at the office of mailing, and that to facilitate the prepayment of the postage on newspapers and avoid the labor and expense of placing stamps on and canceling the same, the Postmaster-General be authorized to fix a certain sum per pound for the weight of newspapers delivered to any post-office for forwarding through the mail. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition, signed by a large number of citizens of the county of Colfax, in the Territory of New Mexico, and also of the county of Las Animas, in the Territory of Colorado, in which they set forth that a corporation, styling itself the Maxwell Land-Grant and Railway Company, declares absolute ownership to a tract of land of an area of four hundred and fifty square leagues under the guise of a Mexican land grant, known as the "Beau-bien and Miranda grant," and they pray that Congress will enact a law defining and construing the confirmation act of June 21, 1860, and limiting the amount of land to which the grantees and their representatives may be entitled in said grant, by the statement of the original grantees to the Mexican authorities. In this petition the nature of the claim and prayer is set forth. I have had some hesitation as to the committee to which it should go, but I have concluded to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SARGENT. It seems to me that that petition had better be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. The Committee on Private Land Claims ought to report some measure that will ascertain whether there are any, and what extent of, valid land grants in New Mexico and Colorado. I understand that nearly the whole of these two Territories is plastered over by pretended land grants, and I have noticed on looking back that one or two bills have passed Congress confirming millions of acres of land in a body to a single individual or to a company; and a proposition has been introduced into the Senate during this session that the Government shall survey these enormous tracts, which we have heretofore confirmed, at its own expense, that these parties may secure the full possession of the lands. I do not believe that the Mexican government was so improvident as to grant these enormous areas to a few individuals, and there ought to be an incisive investigation into the whole matter, in order that the settlers who go to these Territories may have the opportunity to know whether they are going on public lands or not. I believe there are great frauds in these Mexican grants, and I should like to have the subject go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me ask my friend, does he think this petition should go to the Committee on Private Land Claims rather than to the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Public Lands is overwhelmed with business, and the Committee on Private Land Claims has much less. So far as the personnel of the two committees is concerned, I think both trustworthy; but the petition had better be referred to the committee which has the less to do, for that reason.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his suggestion, and I accept it. I make that motion.

Mr. BOGY. I think that this matter should be sent to the Committee on Private Land Claims. The whole Territory of New Mexico and a large portion of Colorado are covered by the vast grants mentioned by the Senator from California. In my opinion the only way to reach the subject (which is of paramount importance to that whole country, and until it is settled that country can never be fully inhabited) is to refer it to a commission; and I, as a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, desire that this subject be referred to that committee, so that a bill may be matured in time throwing the whole investigation of these private land claims in New Mexico, in Colorado, and in portions of Utah, into the hands of a board of commissioners, as was done formerly in Upper Louisiana and in Florida. There is no other way for Congress to get at the subject in an intelligent manner than by referring it to a board of commissioners. I therefore hope the petition will now go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of the First Congregational church of Lowell, Massachusetts, signed by its pastor, Rev. Smith Baker, and other officers of the church; the petition of Hon. George Richmond, mayor, and 128 citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts; the petition of George H. Wilson and other citizens of Lynn, Massachusetts; the petition of A. Norcross and 52 other citizens of Fitchburgh, Massachusetts; the petition of Rev. W. J. Hambleton and 40 other citizens of Woburn, Massachusetts; and the petition of Otis L. Bonney and 16 other citizens of Hanson, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the memorial of John M. Robinson and other prominent business men and bankers, citizens of Louisville, Kentucky, and its vicinity, praying for an amendment of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, accompanying a statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, showing the indebtedness on account of the Indian service prior to July 1, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, asking Congress to consider the propriety of taking into its hand the subject of quarantine regulations, as affecting the commerce of the country, and of providing by law such a system of quarantine, with such mode of enforcement, as will preserve the health of the public without impairing the interests of commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present the petition of citizens of Southern Oregon praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Port Orford, in that State. Among other reasons given in the petition they call attention to an extract from the report of Henry M. Robert, of the Engineer Corps, recently made, in which that officer uses this language:

> On the seven hundred and fifty miles of sea-coast between San Francisco and the Straits of Fuca, a distance equal to that from New York and Charleston, there is not a single harbor that can be entered during a southerly gale. Twenty-five miles south of, midway between, these points, is Port Orford, according to the United States Coast Pilot by far the best summer roadstead on the coast between Los Reyes and the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN presented the petition of George W. Miller, and other citizens of Miami County, Ohio, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OGLESBY. I present the memorial of 150 farmers and workingmen of La Salle County, Illinois, praying for the repeal of the national banking law and the substitution of legal-tenders convertible into 3.65 per cent. bonds reconvertible into legal-tenders and the legal-tenders convertible back into bonds, and so on ad infinitum, at the pleasure of whoever shall hold any of either. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TRANSPORTATION QUESTION.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask leave to present, in the nature of a memorial, the following conclusions from the National Board of Trade, presented to this body after their deliberations recently at Baltimore:

> The National Board of Trade having had under consideration the subject of increasing and cheapening the means of transportation in the United States, and especially as this question has a bearing upon the general welfare of the whole country, beg leave to respectfully submit to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled the following as the conclusions of the body touching this important and engrossing subject; and to ask the favorable consideration of the Government to the suggestions herein contained:
> First. That increase of facilities and cheapening of rates of transportation between the interior and the sea-board are no longer to be considered measures of local advantage, but have become national necessities.
> Secondly. That the only complete and permanent restraint upon unreasonable exactions for transportation must be sought in the development and improvement of the natural water routes, to the end that these highways for our commerce may move freight during as much of the year as possible at the lowest possible rates, and thus subject the railroads to the regulation of wholesome competition. We therefore rejoice at the commencement of important improvements in the Welland and Saint Lawrence Canals by the Dominion of Canada; in the efforts by the State and citizens of New York to improve methods of transportation by the canals of that State; in the close attention given to other projects of interior water communication; and trust that the improvement of the Mississippi River and other great national water ways of the country may be pushed without delay to completion.
> Thirdly. That it is inexpedient for Congress at the present time to assume any pecuniary obligations, or to make any appropriations in aid of artificial means of transportation.
> In behalf of the National Board of Trade.
> FREDERICK FRALEY, of Philadelphia, President.
> CHARLES RANDOLPH, of Chicago, Secretary.

I present these conclusions of the National Board of Trade as an expression of its views upon this most important question. The National Board of Trade has representatives from perhaps twenty States in the Union; and in presenting their conclusions upon this question to the national Congress I think they are entitled to respect and attention; and in that sense I present them here, wishing to direct public attention upon all proper occasions to this subject.

I must insist—and in doing so I say nothing new to this body—that this question to-day of cheap transportation is demanding at this hour more of the public attention than the question of finance. I know of no question that concerns the western people so deeply, so profoundly, as this question of cheap water and cheap railway transportation. I hope that the select committee who are now investigating that subject will be prepared at an early day to submit to the consideration of this body some practical measure for the solution of this difficult problem. If the people of the West are to have the prices of their products fixed by the rates established in Liverpool and London; if the foreign market is to fix the price of the grains, the products of this nation, then it does become an important question to the people of the West, and of the whole Union, as to what the charges shall be between the point of production in the United States and the point of consumption in Europe. The very moment that our products exceed our home demand, and we begin to export them to foreign countries, that moment the price of every bushel of corn and wheat is fixed by the foreign and not by the home market. So that it is a material question to the people of the United States, and especially to the people of the West, as to what the charges shall be between the point of production and the point of consumption. I believe I do not transgress the bounds of moderation when I state that the charges now imposed by railways, by steamship, by the middle-men, by the commission merchants, exceed three to four times the price the producer receives.

This question, Mr. President, must be met in some form or other by the people of the United States, and more particularly by the Congress of the nation. We cannot much longer avoid it. I do not know where the solution is to come from. We have relied upon competition between railroads until we have lost almost all hope of bringing them to fair and just charges for the transportation of our products. At this very hour there is a serious question pending in the Legislature of my own State as to whether the power is vested in the Legislature of Illinois, under an amended constitution, to regulate the freights and fares for the transportation of their products. The old common-law doctrine is constantly met at every point and every turn in this question; the old common-law doctrine meets the producer with the statement that he shall have his freight transported for a reasonable compensation, and that if the charges are more than reasonable he is left free to go to the courts to have them settled by a court and jury. How impossible it is for a man who has paid ten cents more than he ought to have paid for a ride, or who has paid a bill of three to five dollars more than he ought to have paid for the shipment of a few bushels of wheat and corn or a few barrels of flour—how hopeless the task is for him to enter a court of justice and have the charges brought back to reasonable rates by proceedings in the courts! The expense meets him at once, appalls him, and drives him away; and there is, therefore, with all small shippers no redress according to the old rule of the common law, that their goods shall be carried at reasonable rates, and that that question must be determined in every instance by a court and jury. We have been trying to circumvent if we can that necessity which heretofore, in the eyes of the common law, has driven us through that channel for redress. A nearer and shorter, but a more just route, must be found out in order to bring justice to these people.

I feel that the people of the West, moderate and reasonable under all circumstances upon all matters almost, are no more than reasonable and moderate now in their demands for the national Government to give consideration to this question. We must meet it in some shape or other. I belong to that political party, I belong to that class of liberal thinkers who firmly believe the power in the Constitution of the United States may be found to rightly consider and justly settle any question of national importance. I believe ours is a Government in fact, with well-defined powers, and that the powers granted are ample and full to meet the exigencies at all times, in war and peace, of this people. I do not mean to be curbed, I do not mean to be cramped in my views of the proper construction of that instrument. It is the instrument of the people, it is the instrument that makes us a nation and a power upon the globe to-day; and I believe, according to my politics, according to republican politics, that the power may be found in the Constitution of the United States to meet this question of transportation. I believe the power resides there to regulate and control the railroads of the Republic. I believe we may cross State lines, we may look into the States, through a constitutional law of Congress, to regulate this question, to construct railroads, to construct canals and other highways of commerce and trade, until the people of all portions of the country shall be placed in equal condition as to rights and interest in all respects. I do not know how many years it will be before our fellow-citizens of the Eastern and sea-board States will be appealing to us for redress on this very question. We are all sisters or brothers, as the case may be, in the Republic. I have no local feeling which would drive me away from perfect and complete justice to the Eastern States, either financially or on this question of transportation, or any other; but if we of the West shall be so cramped and confined for want of constitutional power as to be compelled to consume our own products, if we shall be driven through the channels of invention and genius to find out the means of consuming at home what we produce, because we shall not obtain fair rates abroad, because our profits shall be ground out and consumed by transportation charges, it may not be a quarter of a century until the Eastern States and Europe itself may be clamoring for the products of the great West and the great interior. We are a free, active, and industrious people; and if we can get no other remedy we will transfer in the course of reasonable time the manufacturing industries of Great Britain and of the Eastern States to the West and the interior; we will bring the wealth along as fast as we can command it, by that earnest and honorable competition, however, which makes trade permanent and prosperity desirable.

Sir, who can count the bushels of surplus product of the West? Is there an honorable Senator on this floor to-day who can for a moment comprehend the surplus products even of the ten Northwestern States? Can you estimate in tons or in bushels the surplus quantity we have for shipment of pork, beef, flour, corn, barley, buckwheat, and rye? It is absolutely appalling when you come to contemplate the result. We must, however, for the present, find a market for it until that other time shall come when we may be able by increased population, by extended industry, by commercial wealth, to absorb and consume the larger portion of it ourselves.

We believe in the Republic. We believe in its power. We believe the national Congress has power to meet this question, and although the National Board of Trade seems to interdict in its conclusions the power of Congress to touch the question of railroads—and I am now presenting this memorial in the name of the National Board of Trade—I differ from them in that conclusion, because I believe the national Congress has the right to touch the railroad question. I believe it has the constitutional power to construct railroads if it shall be considered wise and expedient to do so.

I do not at this moment go so far as to express the unqualified opinion that we can by law regulate the freights and charges of private corporations, of private railway companies, chartered by State legislation. I have not made up my mind to go that far yet. But I have no difficulty whatever in going to the length of believing that the national Congress may pass a law establishing railways, creating railway companies and railway corporations, and may confer power on such corporations to construct railways, to charge fares and freights, subject to the power of Congress to regulate them, for the transportation of passengers and freights. I have no doubt that the Government itself may do so. But as to whether I would as a Senator here, with the responsibility of a constituency of three millions behind me, venture to vote to appropriate from the national Treasury at this time the money to build a road by the national Government, is a very different question. I am very frank to confess to the grangers, to the farmers' clubs, to the republicans and democrats, and the citizens generally of the West, that I have not yet made up my mind that it is my duty to vote a dollar out of the national Treasury to construct a solitary highway.

I would be willing to build one double-track steel railway of the most complete and durable character, that would last forever, from New York or some other point on the Atlantic coast to the West. I could not vote for that now; but I know perfectly well, and I tell my people in Illinois that when I attempt to cast such a vote and ask for such a road, I will be expected by honorable Senators here to cast votes for at least fifteen or twenty other such roads. I am not prepared to go that far, and shall not now commit myself to a project which would be so hazardous to the national finances.

I have submitted these views in connection with this subject very briefly, but would not have taken the time of the Senate to have done so if I could have found any other convenient occasion. I am not sure that I have hit the right time now; but, at any rate, I have unburdened myself, and now I ask that the memorial or petition be referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, with the request that that committee may, within as reasonable a time as possible, present the conclusions of their deliberations upon this intricate and complicated question. I am perfectly willing to give them reasonable time. I know how grave the question is. I know how much study it will require, after the vast field they have been over during the last eight or ten months, to digest and present a plan; and, indeed, I will go so far as to say to that committee that I have no great hope, after all their labor and thought, they will be enabled to present a satisfactory and final solution of it. I cannot venture to hope for so much; but I do believe they will present something. I shall wait patiently until it comes. If then it should meet my approval I will give it a hearty support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to that committee.

Mr. BOGY. If it is in order I should like to say a few words upon the very subject upon which the honorable Senator from Illinois has addressed the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to submit a few words on the subject just discussed by the Senator from Illinois. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, the question of transportation from the West to the sea-board, as every Senator is aware, has assumed an importance which is very great. The products of that section in all the cereals and meat crop have become so large that the question of transportation is one of very great importance. We all feel it. Hence, a new party in the West has arisen. Now, although I do not rise on this occasion to give in my adhesion to the party called the grangers, this I will say, as I have said before in my own State, that without giving my adhesion to that new organization, yet I hail the birth and organization of it with a great deal of pleasure. The farmers of the West feel that there is something wrong. Whether it arises because our financial system is not adapted to promote their prosperity, or whether the transportation is too expensive, or whether it is proper for them to send to a foreign market, or whether it would be more judicious for them to have a home market, or whether the mouth of the Mississippi River should be improved so that they may have an easy outlet to the ocean, are all questions which have to be examined in order to come to a solution of this great problem. I am in full sympathy with my suffering section. I am in full sympathy with the people of my own State and the adjoining States on that subject; for I have had occasion to know, and I do know, that they are greatly the sufferers.

But, in my opinion, the danger that nothing may be done will arise from the position taken by my friend, the Senator from Illinois; for if the national Government undertakes to go into a system of railroads built by the nation, the subject assumes such complications and such magnitude, besides the exercise of a doubtful power at best, that the result will be that nothing will be done.

Now, I do hope that this Committee on Transportation will confine their investigation to one subject, for the present at least, and that is, to the opening of the water routes of the interior of the country to the ocean; to the opening of the Mississippi River from the headwaters of that river to the Gulf of Mexico; to the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio, of the Missouri, of all the large streams of the West; and, if that be done, in my estimation all that the West requires for the present will be done; and as to the power to do that there will be no question, and the appropriation necessary for doing it would be insignificant; at most, a few hundred thousand dollars.

If the mouth of the Mississippi, either by canal or otherwise, can be made so that vessels of the largest class will be able to come up to the port of New Orleans, and if the Mississippi can be made navigable at all seasons of the year, by the removal of sand-bars, snags, and other obstructions, you will have afforded to the great West the means of cheap transportation. It will be then in their power themselves to solve this problem. They will then ascertain for themselves whether a foreign market be the market which they need, or whether the time has not come for the great West with its vast production to cease looking to the foreign and distant markets and to build up a market at home. Give them the ability of making the test.

Now, sir, we are talking continually of the foreign market, and we say if we could only get to the foreign market our troubles would be removed. Give us the means of getting to that foreign market. If that will remove the troubles, well and good; but if then their troubles are not removed, another step in some other direction will have to be taken. My idea is, that the solution of that great problem will in time come when your foreign markets, to a great extent, are abandoned. The West is becoming too great, its products are too vast, to seek a foreign market for its cereals, its corn and wheat and its bulky cheap articles. A ton of corn weighs as much as a ton of gold, and the transportation, therefore, of a ton of corn to a distant foreign market will always eat it up; although it may be transported by the railroad itself for little or nothing, the mere handling of it will eat it up. It has to be handled by half a dozen middle-men before it gets to the mouth of the consumer. It is too cheap an article. The West will have to look at that great subject in another light. In the mean time give them the means of reaching the ocean, give them the means of getting to the foreign market, and if that gives them a sufficient outlet for their products the problem is solved, and if not it will have to be solved in a different way. But let us not contemplate for the present the building of double-track railroads with steel rails. Let that rest for the time being, and let us confine our efforts and our expenditures to the opening of the great water-routes of the interior of the continent to the ocean.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the memorial of Gibson Brothers, Joseph L. Pearson, and others, employing printers of Washington, concerning the Government Printing Office. The petitioners allege that it has become the practice of the courts to order at the Public Printing Office the printing of records of cases to which the United States is not a party, and the expense of which ought to be paid by the litigants themselves. If any inadvertence of this kind has been done, doubtless the judge will correct it. But it is proper to state that it is not the fault of the Congressional Printer, who has no discretion in the matter, a certain amount being appropriated to pay the expenses of printing for the courts, and being expended under the order of the courts. If anything of that kind has taken place, it has been, doubtless, through an inadvertence.

The petitioners also complain of the printing of speeches of members of Congress at the Government Printing Office, which they say is done without the name or similitude of law or justice or right. As members of Congress nowadays are accused of stealing everything, from a railroad to a tooth-pick, I ought to state that any speeches which are printed at the Government Printing Office, are paid for by those who order them, and are printed under the statute which allows any person, member of Congress or otherwise, to obtain by paying for them any number of documents printed by the Congressional Printing Office.

Many other grievances are alleged here which I will not refer to. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to make an inquiry of the Senator. Am I to understand him to say explicitly that no such practice as is supposed by the memorialists exists in regard to printing speeches?

Mr. ANTHONY. I say if they are printed at the Government Printing Office, (and they are printed there,) they are printed at the expense of those who order them, and are printed under the statute. There is an express law which authorizes any document printed at the Government Printing Office to be purchased by any individual; and as these speeches are set up in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the same type is used to print them for distribution on the order of members of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is it the abuse of printing that is complained of, or is the abuse supposed to be in printing them without pay?

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose the petitioners think they are printed without pay, for I do not conceive it could be considered an abuse by anybody that the speeches which are delivered in Congress are printed at the Public Printing Office at the expense of those who order them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That fact the Senator thinks does not exist; they are not printed without compensation?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers of William Bowlin and Alvis Smith be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BOGY, it was Ordered, That Washington Crosland, praying payment for damages arising from the seizure and use of his property by the Government in the city of Saint Louis, have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the papers in the case of Dr. William Trevitt, consul at Valparaiso, Chili, asking payment of salary and clerk hire, to report that that committee ought to be discharged from their further consideration, and they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which has charge of all matters relating to consuls; and that committee, having all the facts before them, can more properly judge what is right than the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON also, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Rufus Mead, United States consul at San Juan del Sur, praying compensation for services rendered in the absence of C. N. Riotte, minister near the government of Nicaragua, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a petition of a committee appointed by the Washington Central Temperance League, praying for an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of constructing a building for the use of the hospital for inebriates, and to whom was also referred the bill (S. No. 233) for the incorporation of the National Washington Home, which seems to be to carry out the object of the petitioners, have instructed me to report the same back, and to say that while they might sympathize entirely with the object of this bill and the prayer of these petitioners, and while under other circumstances they might not be disinclined to give aid in the direction indicated by the bill and petition, they cannot shut their eyes to the fact that there is a demand everywhere now for the utmost economy in public expenditures, nor to the further fact that the Government is absolutely needing buildings at this time, which our finances render us quite unable to furnish, for purposes that are absolutely necessary, and in view of the fact also that we do not believe that it is the policy of the Government at this time to enter upon the erection of any public buildings—in view of these considerations they instruct me to report back the bill and petition, and recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed, and that they be discharged from further consideration of the petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 6) relating to certain moneys appropriated to members of Congress, have instructed me to report adversely, and to ask that it be indefinitely postponed. I wish to say, in explanation of this report, that the substance of this bill was incorporated into the one that passed the Senate on the subject of salaries.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 306) for the relief of George F. Heideman, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CLAYTON. In this connection I ask that the commission of this officer, which was with the papers accompanying the bill, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, in order that it may be forwarded to him by the clerk of the Military Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Anderson J. Smith, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment of Illinois Infantry, praying for compensation as lieutenant, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 341) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. THURMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ships Wyoming and Ta Kiang; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 343) for the relief of purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 344) for the relief of William Bowlin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 345) for the relief of Alvis Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 346) for the relief of Howell H. Trask; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 348) to amend an act entitled "An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 349) to create a reservation in the Territory of Washington for the Cœur d'Alenes and other Indian tribes therein named; which was read twice by its title, referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to introduce a bill providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and present a report of the Secretary of the Treasury and other papers connected therewith. I ask that the bill and papers be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that bill provide?

Mr. SHERMAN. For the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company. The appropriation has been made, and this bill provides how it shall be applied.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; which was read a first time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the bill read in full.

The Chief Clerk read the bill the second time, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the appropriations made by the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the payment of the debts of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, are hereby continued in full force and are made permanently applicable to the payment of the debts of the said Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and so much as may be necessary shall be applied to the payment of the interest as it accrues and the principal of the outstanding bonds of said company as they mature: Provided, however, The Secretary of the Treasury may purchase and pay for any of the said bonds at their market price whenever he deems it for the interest of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the main part of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reading has gone far enough to satisfy me that it is a permanent appropriation, which we are all against.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed with the accompanying papers.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 351) to amend an act entitled "An act confirming and extending a patent right to Levi W. Pond and the Eau Claire Lumber Company," approved June 10, 1872; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 352) to repeal an act entitled "An act confirming and extending a patent right to Levi W. Pond and the Eau Claire Lumber Company," approved June 10, 1872; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of employing a competent person or persons to make a preliminary topographical survey of the grounds around the Capitol, and to furnish a plan for laying out and the improving of the same.

ADDITIONAL PAY OF TREASURY CLERKS.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the Senate how much of the appropriation for additional clerks and additional compensation to clerks in his office, (contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial act, making appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1873, approved May 8, 1872,) has been paid under these heads respectively; that is, how much for additional clerk hire and how much for additional compensation; and that he likewise inform the Senate who received this additional compensation, at what rate per annum they were paid under its provisions, and what was the salary of these clerks respectively as provided by law.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take from the table the resolution for the admission of P. B. S. Pinchback to a seat in this body; and I will state the purpose for which I desire to have it taken up. It is that I may make this motion: that the credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to investigate the circumstances attending the election of said Pinchback to a seat in this body.

I will state to the Senate that since the adjournment of the Senate on last Friday evening I have received information which I think makes it important to the State of Louisiana, and to the Senate and to the country, that an investigation touching the circumstances of this election be made. I ask, therefore, to have this resolution taken up for the purpose of enabling me to make the motion I have stated.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, as I understand it, I have the floor on Louisiana affairs. I have been for a long time postponing my remarks with a view of accommodating the views of others who were anxious to discuss the financial question; but if it meets the views of the Senate I will appoint Monday next to address the Senate, commencing at one o'clock. I object to the present consideration of the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair.) The motion of the Senator from Indiana, being objected to, is not now in order.

Mr. MORTON. It is true that the Senator from Kentucky has the floor on that resolution. I therefore give notice that on Monday I will move to take the resolution from the table for the purpose of submitting the motion of which I have now given notice.

Mr. McCREERY. First giving me the opportunity of speaking on that day.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator of course can have that privilege.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator will have his motion printed, so that we can understand it.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be printed.

NATIONAL RAILROAD SYSTEM.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of a resolution offered by myself on the 8th day of December last, which is now upon the table. I simply ask to call up the resolution, not for the purpose of much discussion, but for the purpose of making a few remarks in relation to its reference. It will take but a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Whereas under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States the power is vested in Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States," and "to establish post-offices and post-roads;" and whereas the ability to conduct commercial transactions among the several States, and the power to convey with cheapness, regularity, and dispatch, the United States mails, depend to a very great extent upon the means of transportation afforded by railroads; and whereas under existing laws lines of railroad projected in or through two or more States cannot be constructed or operated without the authority of said States, obtained either under general laws or by special enactments, thus leaving it in the power of a single State to shut out and prevent railroads from entering or passing through its territory from other States, no matter how manifestly the interests of commerce among the States may suffer thereby; and whereas it is believed by many persons that by reason of the exclusive privileges granted to railroad corporations by the Legislatures of some of the States, and by reason of combinations entered into by such corporations with each other, for the purpose of monopolizing the carrying-trade, some of the said corporations and combinations have become so powerful as to enable them to control the Legislatures of some of the States to the extent of preventing the organization of rival and competing corporations, whereby competition, which is the very life of commerce, is stifled, and the growth of the productive interests of the country and the efficiency of the United States mail-service are retarded; and whereas it is the duty of Congress to provide for the people cheap, frequent, and convenient mail facilities, and it is also its duty, so far as the power in it lies, not only to protect the commercial and productive interests of the country from the evil effects of monopolies, but to provide an easy and ready way by which the great carrying trade of the country, conducted by the means of railroads, may be thrown open to full and free competition: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Railroads be instructed to consider the expediency of reporting a bill providing for a general system of railroad incorporation, whereby persons may, by complying with the necessary requirements, become bodies corporate and politic for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating railroads for public use and for the transportation of the United States mails; said bill to contain provisions reserving to Congress the right to make such laws and regulations for the safety and comfort of passengers as may be deemed necessary from time to time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I only wish to make a few remarks in relation to the reference of the resolution. This resolution suggests an inquiry of a twofold nature: first, has Congress the power under the Constitution to authorize corporations to construct railroads lying in or passing through two or more States of the Union without the consent of the Legislatures thereof; and, second, assuming that it has the power, is it expedient to exercise that power by providing by law for a general system of railroad incorporation? I believe that Congress has the power, and that it is expedient to exercise it. When I introduced this resolution some weeks ago, it was then my intention to make some remarks upon the question of expediency principally; but since I find myself met at the threshold by the constitutional branch of the question, and since I am painfully aware of my inability, not being a lawyer, to discuss that branch of the question, especially in the presence of so many able lawyers who have devoted the best years of their lives to investigations of this character, I have concluded to defer any discussion I may desire to make on this subject until, at least, the Senate may be enabled to get the views of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I think, in view of the many measures which are now pressing upon Congress looking to the incorporation of new railroad companies or to the regulation and control of those already constructed, and in view of the great public interest which is felt all over this country in relation to cheap transportation, that the Senate ought at some early day to undertake to determine what our constitutional powers are in the premises; so that, should we conclude that we have the power, we may by so doing make it unnecessary to discuss the constitutional branch of the question upon each individual measure that may come before us; or if, on the other hand, we conclude we have not the power, then of course all these measures that are pressing upon us will be disposed of at once by that conclusion. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the request that they will at an early day lay before Congress their views upon the constitutional power of Congress to legislate upon the subject suggested by the resolution, as well as upon the subject of the control and regulation of railway companies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1231) to abolish the office of deputy commissioner of internal revenue; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1382) authorizing coinage to be executed at the mints of the United States for foreign countries.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 215) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book, without amendment.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 718) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873; and it was thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his secretary, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the bill (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the consent of the Senate to make a single statement. To avoid misapprehension in regard to a motion of which I gave notice a little while ago, I desire to say that the matter which I propose to have investigated by the Committee on Privileges and Elections does not relate at all to the question whether Mr. Pinchback was elected by the legal Legislature of Louisiana, or to the question whether Mr. Kellogg is the Governor of Louisiana, or to the question of the validity of what is called the Kellogg government; but relates to the personal conduct of Mr. Pinchback himself in regard to that election.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if it is entirely agreeable to the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWNLOW,] who has the floor on the unfinished business, and to other Senators, I should like to ask that the Senate have a short executive session of a few moments now. If no Senator objects, and it is equally agreeable to my friend from Tennessee, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1213) to abolish the office of deputy commissioner of internal revenue, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The bill (H. R. No. 1382) authorizing coinage to be executed at the mints of the United States for foreign countries, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, relative to the duty of Congress to fulfill the pledge contained in the act of March 18, 1869, relative to the redemption of United States notes in coin.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Mr. President, in the southern and western sections of the country, and especially in Tennessee, there has been, and there still remains, much suffering, caused by the want of an adequate supply of money, of any kind, to meet the imperious emergencies of business. Every department of commerce and of manufactures, and every material interest of the whole country, and especially of the sections named, has been deeply injured by this deficiency of money.

It is this state of facts which induces me to break my accustomed silence in this body, and to submit my views upon the gravity of the question, and the most promising measures by which safe and general relief may be realized.

I am the more inclined to submit a few remarks on this subject in consequence of certain views recently expressed in the Senate by several gentlemen for whom I entertain great respect, and, also, because of the fact that something like a concerted movement has been in progress in several important commercial centers evidently designed to induce, if not to force, the Government to reduce the amount of money in circulation and to resort prematurely to a resumption of specie payments. I am distinctly and utterly opposed to reducing the present volume of the currency. I am equally opposed to an immediate resumption of specie payments. Nor can I for a moment agree in opinion with those who distrust the ability and usefulness of our existing system of banking and currency. On the contrary, I hold that, properly administered, it is not only adequate but largely beneficent in its scope. This system sprang into existence during the late civil war. It originated in the necessities created by that war. Yet it has proved a most effective agency in averting the destruction of the Government itself, in preserving intact this sacred Union of States, and, at length, in opening the way to the renewal of the earlier feelings of brotherhood and amity so rudely destroyed by civil strife, but which are so essential to the happiness of society and to the rapid and general development of the country. The financial system so happily conceived and projected by the illustrious and lamented late Chief Justice, while at the head of the Treasury, was, perhaps, a closer approximation to perfection than any which history has recorded. It is no reflection upon the comprehensive skill displayed in establishing this great financial plan that experience has developed deficiencies in it which wise statesmanship should seek to supply. The financial administration of the Government during the war was one which displayed amazing wisdom, and which sheds a luster on the history of that period scarcely, if at all, inferior to that of its political and military departments. Few Americans can be found who question its wisdom or doubt its grand efficiency. Yet it is no disparagement to that system that, with altered conditions of the nation, deficiencies should be disclosed. Among these are the unequal distribution of banking facilities throughout the various States of the Union, and the bestowal of exclusive privileges upon certain classes of our citizens. Let the following comparative facts illustrate the inequality of distribution complained of. With a population of one million and a quarter, Tennessee has a circulation of its national banks of, say, $3,500,000, or a fraction less than two dollars for each person in the State. Rhode Island, with a population of less than a quarter of a million—217,353—has a circulation of, say, $22,000,000—over six times as much as Tennessee—while the population of Tennessee is nearly six times as large as that of Rhode Island; that is, Rhode Island, with one-sixth of the population of Tennessee, has relatively to its population fifty times more circulation than Tennessee. There are, perhaps, other conditions than mere numbers which would reduce this proportion somewhat, yet it does not require much reasoning nor arithmetic to see that the distribution is unequal and unfair.

Free banking has always been a favorite idea with me, and which I may hope yet to see incorporated in our system of finance. But I would by no means favor a return to the system of State banks. Our banking system should be national, and not State. The currency should have equal value in all parts of the country. No man should be obliged, in passing from one State to another, to change his money, perhaps at a loss of one or more per cent., into the currency of the State he enters. It would not be the most convenient or comfortable thing to do, supposing that I leave my home in Tennessee, on my way to Congress, with $500 in Tennessee bank notes, to have to lie over one train on reaching the Virginia line, and get my money changed into notes of the Virginia banks; or, if I were bound for New York, to have to do the same thing on reaching Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York.

Without dwelling longer upon these matters at this moment, I take the liberty of inviting the attention of the Senate to a letter which I have recently received from one of the most valued citizens of Tennessee. It contains a concise and accurate statement of opinions, some of which I have long entertained. The author of this letter has long been known by me. His reputation and character for integrity, patriotism, and for financial experience and skill, give additional value and importance to the views which he enunciates. The letter is as follows:

NASHVILLE, December 2, 1873.

DEAR SIR: "We need about five hundred millions more greenbacks added to our present circulation to enable us to meet the wants of commerce and trade." The foregoing is reported to be the closing paragraph of your letter to Hon. Henry T. Blow, of Saint Louis. I am pleased to find that you are alive upon a subject of such vital importance to our growing country. The extensive territory now covered and settling up in the United States makes it absolutely necessary for a large increase in bank-paper circulation, or, I would say, legal-tenders. I would stipulate for one thousand millions of legal-tenders issued by the Government, and supply the banks with them, and require the banks to take up and return all their circulating notes to be canceled; thereby giving the Government the entire control of all the paper circulation in our country, and at the same time require all payments or collections through the various custom-houses to be made in legal-tender notes. This policy would at once place gold and legal-tenders on a par value. Such a policy is certainly desirable for the credit and stability of our Government; and it opens the way to specie payments without great embarrassment to the country. It would at once inspire confidence and put a stop to the gold gambling in Wall street, New York, and a large portion of the gold in the Treasury might be applied to the liquidation of that amount of our national debt. Who would want gold when the legal-tenders pay all Government dues? Yea, who would want any better money? The bondholders abroad may be paid in sterling exchange, which is gold to them at Liverpool, London, Paris, or elsewhere. You will pardon me for making these suggestions to you, as there will be many opinions and suggestions made in regard to the currency and finances of our country, and as a free American citizen, running fast on the down-hill of time, I cannot conceive it amiss to give you the views of a man now almost seventy-eight years of age. Another advantage the Government will gain is in the notes lost by fire and otherwise, which will amount to a great deal in a few years.

Please accept the assurances of the regard of an old friend and brother,

N. HOBSON.

P. S.—The banks in New York should be prohibited from paying interest on deposits. The banks in the South keep a large amount on interest in the New York banks, the use of which should be given to our own people.

N. HOBSON.

Hon. W. G. BROWNLOW.

Mr. Hobson has not been misinformed as to my views on this deeply interesting and important subject. I most cordially indorse each of the several propositions set forth in this letter as I have more than once and with more or less of publicity heretofore expressed them.

I am utterly at a loss to conceive how any unprejudiced and sound mind can doubt for a moment that the present volume of currency needs enlargement. I agree with Mr. Hobson in regarding the mode of increasing the amount of currency specified by him as by far the most judicious yet propounded. The commercial needs of the country will not be more than supplied by the circulation of $1,000,000,000 in legal-tender notes. To have money in circulation under the authority of the Government, and which money is not recognized by the Government as having all the qualities of a sound and proper circulating medium, seems to me to be a mere sham, an absurdity. Every dollar issued in the name or under the authority of the Government should be receivable in discharge of all governmental dues. Only in this way can that commodity which we call money, and which it is alike our policy and duty to make really such, be magnified and made honorable in the view of the commercial world. Only thus can we impart to paper money thus issued the dignity of the Government itself, and inspire proper general confidence as to the ultimate redemption of the whole mass of currency thus put in circulation. In fine, only thus can the notes be made equivalent to gold and silver, and the way be quietly and gradually opened by a safe and easy process to a return to specie payments.

I am fully satisfied that $1,000,000,000 of legal-tender notes, possessing the characteristics and qualities which I have described, would, if equitably distributed, and otherwise administered on sound and correct banking principles, prove of incalculable benefit to the country.

In the State of Tennessee the financial and business situation is most critical. Unless in some way the amount of the circulating medium can be judiciously expanded and fairly distributed the most disastrous results will follow. If, instead of expansion of the money circulation in Tennessee, contraction were now to be adopted, it would inevitably cause the destruction of thousands of the most enterprising citizens of the State, and it would produce such a general prostration, indeed such a complete overthrow of all the material interests of the State, as cannot be contemplated without the most serious alarm.

The immediate resumption of specie payments would be as cruel and destructive in its effect as would be the confinement of living creatures of any kind in an exhausted receiver. On behalf of those whom I have, in part, the honor to represent in this body, I most earnestly invoke commiserative justice.

It is not my purpose here and now to discuss formally and elaborately the subjects of banks and banking. I cannot altogether agree with the celebrated Mr. Fox, of England, who is reported to have said that "he did not regard political economy as a science;" though it is quite surprising, and not a little amusing, to observe the great variety of opinions and theories to which, in oversubtle and ingenious minds, the simplest financial propositions sometimes give rise.

I might have recourse to the massive volumes of recondite learning on this subject to be found in libraries, and importing them into the body of a speech I might thus gain among the shallow and the undiscerning a momentary tribute as profoundly versed in the mysteries of financial science and as a great political economist. But I have no such ambition to gratify, no such purpose to serve. I have only desired, on this occasion, to state frankly and explicitly the views I hold upon the several important questions to which I have referred. Whatever others may think of our paper-money system; whatever sneering, contemptuous allusions may be indulged as to the character of the money put in circulation by our Government or under its authority, as compared with the efficiency of gold and silver money, I have ever regarded it, as I still do, as worthy of all the confidence and commendation which its friends have heretofore been in the habit of bestowing upon it. Originating, as all know it to have done, under the dire necessities of war, and answering so well for so long a period the purposes for which it was created, I can see no good reason for parting with it altogether, nor for weakening its efficacy in the fields of commerce while the consequences engendered by the war are still to a large extent lingering among us.

Based, as our system of currency is, upon the most solid bonded security; backed, as every legal-tender note which can be issued is, by the entire credit and resources of the Government—a Government whose scrupulous fidelity in fulfilling pecuniary engagements has never been seriously questioned—I cannot but believe that, with a sound and pure administration of our financial concerns, not the slightest danger is to be apprehended of any considerable depreciation hereafter in the legal-tender notes which it is proposed shall supply our whole currency.

The chief danger in this matter, as it seems to me, stands closely connected with the habitual use of the language of decrial and ridicule, so common of late on this subject in the two Houses of Congress and elsewhere.

Public confidence is the sole support of any moneyed system which can be devised. It is, therefore, greatly to be desired that we shall take care not to undermine the only ground upon which our present system of finance and currency can hope to stand.

Let us, then, move forward firmly in the plain pathway of duty, unterrified by the clamors of interested and rapacious parties who hope to profit by disasters which they seek to entail upon the masses of their fellow-countrymen by the financial policy which they would have inaugurated. The policy of these money-sharks, instead of expanding the currency to meet the demands of trade and commerce, the rapidly growing population of the country, its great extension over an immense area, and its unequaled activity and enterprise, would, for selfish purposes, suddenly diminish the amount of the circulating medium. By this method, this scheming, rapacious class would seek and secure their own sudden enrichment while wide-spread panic, disaster, and bankruptcy would sweep over the whole country.

We are not to legislate with a view to increase the wrongful gains of this already bloated class of men who throng the great centers of commerce, and who obviously prefer the increase of their own gains to the prosperity and happiness of that Government which secures to them protection and freedom; but we are to legislate for what will produce the largest amount of material prosperity to the masses of our citizens.

Contraction is stagnation, disaster, ruin. Wise and moderate expansion, to bring the volume of the currency to the measure of our needs, is the talisman of safety, peace, and unhindered development.

[Mr. GORDON addressed the Senate in remarks, which will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I agree substantially with the remarks that have been made on this floor in regard to our want of money; but we need one thing besides more money, and that is better money. We want more and better money than we now have. I shall try in the few remarks that I shall submit to show how we can have more and better money; and I shall try to be as practical as possible.

Mr. President, what the business of this nation requires is stability. The business of the nation will conform itself to almost any conceivable state of facts, so that those facts be permanent. It is the frequent changes that disturb the great business centers. It makes very little difference whether your duties be high or low, whether your internal revenue be much or little, the business of the country will conform itself to the facts as they exist; but your perpetual changes derange, disturb, overturn, and destroy the business of the nation. Why, sir, look at the variations that have taken place in values within a short period. I hold in my hand a statement taken from a barometer as infallible as a weather-gauge, to wit, the report of the stock, gold, and bond markets in the city of New York at different periods.

First, I have the quotations of the day before the panic commenced, the 15th of September last, and then I have the quotations of four different periods besides that one.

On the 15th day of September, 1873, your new 5 per cents were quoted at 112¼; on the 30th day of October, six weeks after, they were quoted at 108; and on the 13th day of January, 1874, they were 112¼, or a quarter of 1 per cent. higher than they were the day before the panic commenced. These are facts that are worth studying, for they show that such a degree of change must be absolutely disastrous to any business that can be transacted.

On the 15th day of September last your five-twenties of the May and November issue stood in the market at New York at 115⅞; on the 30th day of October, six weeks thereafter, they stood at 108; and on the 13th day of January, 1874, they stood at 116, or one-eighth of 1 per cent. higher than they were the day before the panic commenced.

You are here legislating for what? For a panic; and the panic has ceased to exist. You are legislating for a thing that has passed away; legislating for an exceptional state of facts that has ceased to exist.

But let me go on a little further. On the 15th day of September your five-twenties of the January and July issue stood at 116¼; on the 30th day of October they stood at 112¼, and on the 13th day of January, 1874, at 116⅛, or one-quarter of 1 per cent. higher than they were the day before the panic. Gold on the 15th of September stood at 111; on the 30th day of October at 108, and on the 13th day of January, 1874, at 111⅝. So go through the list; there is not a dividend-paying stock on the list that has not entirely recovered from the effects of the panic. Take, for example, the New York and Hudson River Railroad. On September 15th the stock of that company stood at 103⅜; on the 30th of October it stood at 81½, and on the 13th of January, 1874, 102½—the merest fraction of a difference from what it was before the panic. Take Harlem Railroad stock; it stood on the 15th of September at 128⅞; on the 30th of October at 101½, and on the 13th of January, 1874, at 125½. So then substantially all the dividend-paying stocks on the market have recovered from the effects of the panic; and yet we are legislating for a state of things that has ceased to exist.

Mr. President, the remark with which I commenced was that these changes were absolutely fatal to all the business interests of this nation. To insure business prosperity, we ought to have something permanent, something substantial. Then the business of the country will conform to the facts so established, and will regulate itself accordingly. This panic, as is well known, was exceptional, as indeed all panics are. A panic among men is precisely like a panic among animals. I once saw two thousand horses stampede, and they were just as ourselves—as the same number of thousands of men would be—in a panic. It is the feeling of animal fear, and one encourages the other, and so it goes on until it becomes a perfect insane rush for something, nobody knows what.

Prior to this late panic, as is well known, many of our capitalists had overinvested in wild railroad schemes; they had undertaken to do impossible things. When the panic struck them it ought not to have had the least effect outside of Wall street and operators in railroad stocks. But the panic swept like a tornado all over the land; affected values everywhere, values of all kinds. Whoever had money in bank sought to draw it out and hide it away. The panic was universal; and yet this nation was never more prosperous in the world than it was the day before the panic struck; and to-day there is as much money in the Union as there was then; every dollar that was here then is here now. Besides, the enormous borrowers, the men who would pay any price for money—1 per cent. a day, ½ per cent. a day, or any other given price—have failed and gone out of the market. The enormous borrowers are not now there; and I predict that before thirty days from this time we shall see money cheaper in New York than it has been for the last thirty years. The speculators, the men who are disturbing values, are out of the way; and now the money in the market is for the legitimate demands of commerce, and is seeking the legitimate channels of commerce for interest and use.

Mr. President, I am for expansion, and a larger expansion than any other man has proposed upon this floor. I am, at the same time, in favor of improvement as well as expansion. The best time for the resumption of specie payments that has occurred since the suspension was in 1865, at the close of the war, when gold had fallen from over 200 to 122. In a few days values had shrunk, and the people of the nation were comparatively out of debt, and were ready then for a resumption of specie payments; but the Government was not. The Government owed more than $1,000,000,000 that was maturing rapidly, maturing daily, in the shape of compound-interest notes, seven-thirties, and other obligations, that must be funded or disposed of. Hence the Government was not prepared for specie payments at that time, although the people were. The people were out of debt all over the country. They had obtained high prices for everything they had to sell during the war. The farmers were out of debt, the business of the country was transacted for cash, and the whole country was comparatively out of debt; but the Government was not. The Government owed over one thousand millions of debt that was maturing within a very short time, and must be funded or in some way taken care of; and therefore the Government at that time was not ready for the resumption of specie payments. From that day to this we have been drifting and floating further and further and further away every hour from the true path, to wit, the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. President, on the 30th day of October last we had discounted, and more than discounted, all the shrinkage that would have resulted from the resumption of specie payments; and were you to-day to resume payments in coin you would not see one-half the shrinkage that took place during the panic up to the 30th day of October last. I believe in, and I have advocated from the first, the earliest possible return to payment in coin. I believe there is no other standard of value that will stand the test, and I believe the time has arrived, or very nearly arrived, for coming to it. I have not the same timidity in fixing a date that some of my friends on this floor have. I believe that if we were to resolve to-day that we would resume the payment of our greenbacks in coin on the 1st day of January, 1875, and authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow $100,000,000 in coin to be used in the redemption of the greenbacks, sell no more gold until the 1st day of January, 1875, on that day you would have $200,000,000 of coin in your Treasury for the redemption of your greenbacks. In the mean time I would allow the national banks that now hold your greenbacks as a legal reserve to redeem their issues in lawful money of the United States. Then, as you can see at a glance, there would be no great rush for coin; the banks would prefer the greenbacks very much, and in this way I believe that we should put in circulation on the 1st day of January, 1875, substantially, not fifty millions as is suggested by some, or one hundred millions, as is proposed by others, but you would put $250,000,000 in coin into the circulation of the nation. I believe that the scheme is perfectly practicable, and that it can be carried out on that day if you will give notice now that on the 1st day of January, 1875, you will resume the payment of your legal-tender notes in coin at the Treasury of the United States; and I believe that it would be a greater relief to the business interests of this nation than you can in any other way afford to those interests. I am not particular as to the date. I merely suggest the 1st day of January, 1875; but I would accept an earlier date than that if it were deemed more advisable; but certainly I would not extend it more than six months thereafter.

This, Mr. President, I believe to be a perfectly practicable scheme. Then if my honorable friend from Ohio thinks that it would be a good plan to use fifty or one hundred millions in bonds, and that we can use them, I have no objection to that being done; but I do not believe the greenbacks would come in to be redeemed in coin. Every dollar of them that was redeemed would be taken away; and it is not for the interest of the people, or of the banks, or of anybody else to bring in the greenbacks for redemption. You thus, without a jar, without a shock, elevate in value all your legal-tender notes to an absolute equality in value with coin; you relieve the people who are suffering for money; you give them more money, and you give them better money than they have now. Why not do it, Mr. President? Why should we not do it, and do it at once?

There is a great call for an enlargement of your issue of greenbacks. Suppose you were to-day to decide to issue $100,000,000 more of greenbacks, what are you going to do with them? I should like some one to answer me that. What are you going to do with your one hundred millions of greenbacks? There is but one thing which you possibly can do with them; and that is to go into the market and buy your bonds, or else to spend your money, scatter it all over the land in appropriations. I take it there is not a Senator upon this floor who is in favor of extravagant appropriations for any purpose at this session of Congress. Then you must go into the market and buy your bonds. Do you propose to pay a higher price than anybody else would pay for your bonds, in order to enhance their value and raise the price? Not at all. You would not pretend that you would. But you would go into the market and buy bonds.

Mr. President, the men who have your bonds are not the men who want more money. If a man has the bonds to-day, he can get greenbacks for them and get them at the high figures that I have just read—a large percentage higher than the price paid by the Government for them during the panic. Mr. President, you cannot now, and you never can, and you never ought to, turn the Treasury of the United States into a broker's shop. It is no part of the business of this great Government to issue an irredeemable currency. We cannot afford to place ourselves beside the worn-out governments of Europe; we cannot afford to place ourselves on a par with Hayti and Mexico; we are too rich a people to do it; and it is a disgrace to us as a nation that we have allowed it to continue one single hour beyond the hour when it was in our power to remedy the wrong.

Much stress has been laid upon the fact that the Bank of England remained in suspension for twenty-one years, and it has been alluded to over and over and over again in the course of this debate. It is true that the Bank of England did remain in suspension for twenty-one years; but it is equally true that for sixteen years out of those twenty-one England was at war with France, and was subsidizing nearly all the governments of Europe; but within five years from the close of that war she resumed specie payments, and has continued them ever since.

Mr. President, the proposition to increase the volume of your paper currency is a step in the wrong direction, and I for one am utterly opposed to taking even one step in the wrong direction when I know what the right direction is; and I hope that no resolution will pass this body authorizing an increase of the volume of the paper currency, even to the amount of $44,000,000, or $25,000,000, or $1,000,000. We have fixed the sum at which it shall remain, and I trust it will there remain, and that no step will be taken toward an expansion.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBERTSON. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield the floor, as he will hardly be able to conclude his remarks to-day, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from North Carolina is not prepared to speak now, other Senators may go on, if he will give way. Certainly the public business is so pressing that I must insist on disposing of this question soon.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will withdraw the motion if some other Senator is willing to go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to-morrow to get a vote on this proposition if possible. Perhaps some other Senator is prepared to go on now.

Mr. RAMSEY. If there is no other business to be disposed of at this moment, I shall be very much gratified if the Senate will allow me to call up the post-route bill. There is great necessity for that bill. The country is suffering for the want of it, and we might as well dispose of it this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the pending order be laid aside informally and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-route bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if that will displace the special order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion was to lay the special order aside informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The post-route bill will be regarded as before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to be allowed to submit a report from a conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 795) "making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered one and three, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered two, and agree to the same with the following amendment: add at the end of said Senate amendment the following: "Provided, That from and after the passage of this act a sum not exceeding $42,000 shall be paid for reporting the proceedings of each House of Congress for any one Congress, under the direction of the respective Houses; and all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed;" and the Senate agree to the same.

LOT M. MORRILL,
J. W. STEVENSON,
H. B. ANTHONY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES A. GARFIELD,
W. G. DONNAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps I ought to state to the Senate the purport of the action of the committee. The bill as it came from the House provided for the salaries for one year of five reporters employed by the House for reporting their proceedings. The Senate amended the bill as it came from the House by providing for the payment of their own reporters up to the 3d of March next. The House non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate. The bill now, it will be observed, makes a permanent provision for the reporting of both branches. It proposes to appropriate for each House for that purpose the sum of $42,000 for any one Congress, leaving to each branch of Congress to make such contracts for its reporting as it sees fit. That is the upshot of the whole business.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether each House controls its own appointment of reporters.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the report.

The report was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. PATTERSON, which was on page 14, after line 316, to insert under the head of "South Carolina:"

From Rock Hill to Lancaster Court-House; also, from Chester to Lancaster Court-House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I now offer the following amendment, to be inserted on page 6, line 126:

Pearl Station, by Bee Creek and Kampsville, to Hardin, in Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I offer an amendment: after line 208 to insert among the Michigan routes:

From Bad Axe to Lamothe.
From Tyre to Cass City.
From Hartland, via Highland, to Highland Station.
From Ortonville, via Oakwood, to Thomas Station.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 202:

State of Maine:
From Bethel to Albany Post-Office.
From East Auburn, via Turner Centre, to East Turner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON. I move an amendment, to come in after line 299, under "Nebraska:"

From Orton, via Stromsburgh, to Clarksville.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to reconsider the vote taken the other day by which certain words were inserted on my motion after line 321. I gave notice the next day after the amendment was adopted that I would make this motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The amendment was read; which was to add after "Ohio," in line 321, the words:

Oregon:
From Eugene City, via Diamond Lake, Fort Klamath, Sprague's River, Drew's Valley, and Goose Lake, to Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada.
From Newport, Benton County, via Seal Rock on beach Pacific Ocean, mouth of Alsea River, and Peake's Mill, to Alsea Valley.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I now offer the following amendment: after the word "Ohio," in line 321, to insert:

Oregon:
From Eugene City, via McKenzie, Salt Spring, Deschutes wagon-road, and Santiam road, to Upper Ocheco.
From Antelope Valley, via John Day's River, Butte Creek, Lone Rock, and Willow Creek, to Hepner's.
From Canyon City to Winnemucca, Nevada.
From Oakland, via Cole's Valley and French Settlement, to Looking Glass.
From Lebanon, via Harris Ranch, Pilgrim's Camp, to Crawfordsville.
From Scio, via Mount Pleasant, Jordan Valley, to Fox Valley.
From Canyon City, via Susanville, North Fork, John Day, Willow Creek, to Scott's.
From Newport, via Seal Rock on beach of Pacific Ocean, mouth of Alsea River and Peake's Mill, to Alsea Valley.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 65:

From Allen's Factory, in Marion County, Alabama, to Jasper, in Walker County Alabama.
From Elkmont, Limestone County, Alabama, to Pettersville, in same county.
From Florence, Alabama, to Lexington, in same (Lauderdale) county.
From Pikesville, Marion County, Alabama, to Pierce's Mills, in same county.
From Warrior Station, via Hulsey's Stand, Pin Hook, and Demorat, to Jasper Alabama.
From Rogersville, Lauderdale County, Alabama, via Lexington, in same county to Appleton, Tennessee.

Mr. RAMSEY. I wish to ask the Senator whether he has carefully examined the bill and is certain that those routes are not in the bill already?

Mr. SPENCER. I have. They are not in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. I offer an amendment. In lines 117 and 118 the names are put down wrong: "Feronia" should be inserted instead of "Feronica," and "Dorming's Mill" instead of "Downing's Mill."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These corrections will be made unless objection be interposed.

Mr. GORDON. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 118:

From Alapaha to Irwinville.
From Dublin, via McKae, to House Creek.
From Hawkinsville and Vienna, via Drayton and Danville, to Americus.
From Greenville, in Meriwether County, to Hogansville.
From Waynesborough to Forest Hall.
From Sparta to Linton.

These are all in Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer this amendment, to be inserted after line 316:

From Cunningham's store, in Pearson County, North Carolina, to Woodlawn, in said county; and from the present post-office in Cashier's Valley, in Jackson County, in said State, via Henry Jackson's, Joy's Tannery, and George's Mill, to Walhalla, South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I offer the following amendment: after line 69, under the head of "Arkansas," insert:

From Camden to Hope Station, on the Cairo and Fulton Railroad.
From Prescott to Center Point.
From Brinkley to Clarendon.
From Desark to Augusta.
From Lewisville to Texarcana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORWOOD. I offer the following amendment: under the head of "Georgia," insert:

From Mount Airey to Clarkesville.
From Dahlonega, via Porter Springs (Jefferson Logan's,) to Blairsville.
From Temperance to Chancy, in Dodge County.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. The committee have some amendments. I move to strike out on page 14, lines 318 and 319, these words:

From Senecaville, Guernsey County, to Ava, Noble County.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer this amendment: on page 14, line 14, insert under "North Carolina," the words:

From China Grove, via Bastian Cross-Roads, Helig's Mill, Dry's Mill, Reidenour's, to Kendall's store.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer this amendment, to be inserted on page 13, after line 304:

New Hampshire:
From Antrim to North Branch.
From Brookline to Townsend, Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: after line 141, under "Iowa," insert:

From Saint Charles, via New Virginia, to Osceola.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer a further amendment: after line 181, under "Kentucky," insert:

From Barbourville, via Payne's, to Bushe's store.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer a further amendment: after line 379, under "West Virginia," insert:

From Webb's Mills to Big Bend.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: after line 299 insert:

Nebraska:
From Orton, via Stromburgh, to Clarkville.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: after line 374, under "Texas," insert:

From Centre Station to Los Vegas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: after line 309, under "New York," insert:

From Dry Brook to Dean's Corner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: under "North Carolina," after line 316, insert:

From Cashier's Valley to Walhalla, South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: after line 274 insert:

Montana Territory:
From Philippsburgh to the Rock Creek mines.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: after line 305 insert:

New Mexico:
From Santa Fé, New Mexico, via Peñasco, to Taos.
From Los Vegas, via Sapello, to Mora.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I offer another amendment: after line 397 insert:

Wyoming Territory:
From Cheyenne, via Fort Fetterman, to Bozeman, in the Territory of Montana.
From Cheyenne, via Pole Creek, Horse Creek, Hawk Springs, and Red Cloud agency, to Whetstone agency, Dakota Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have an amendment to offer. It is after line 100 to insert:

Delaware:
From Felton to Whibleysburgh.
From Harrington to Union Corner, in the State of Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the bill as a second section:

That all bridges heretofore or hereafter to be erected over the navigable rivers in the United States, or over lakes or the outlets of lakes, or over arms of the sea, or other bodies of water, and all public roads established or hereafter to be established in the States or Territories by competent authority and used as public highways, be, and the same are hereby, established post-roads.

Mr. President, before the sense of the Senate is taken on this amendment I desire to submit a very few general observations on this subject.

We have been in the habit of legislating in the way this bill proposes ever since I have been here, and indeed ever since the foundation of the Government, until we have actually established in different Congresses between fifteen and twenty thousand distinct post-roads. I have before me a document which was laid upon our desks in the early part of the session, constituting a part of the public laws of this country as revised and amended by the commissioners appointed some years since under the authority of Congress. In its title it is "An act to establish post-roads." Omitting the index, there are five hundred and twelve pages of closely printed matter, and the number of post-roads established and enumerated on each page averages more than thirty; and by that rule there are between fifteen and twenty thousand post-roads contained in this document which have been established at different times by Congress. Now the question is, whether it is advisable to go on with this process of enumerating route after route in the form which is contained in this bill.

This bill, when it was reported by the committee and before the numerous amendments which have been ingrafted upon it to-day, had seventeen pages and contained two or three hundred additional post-roads. Now, it seems to me that my amendment will accomplish all that is sought in bills of this character in enumerating by description, as is done in this bill, the particular roads to be established. Thus, for example, under the head of "Alabama," I find in the bill, "from Monroeville, via Newtown Academy, to Pine Apple," &c. And so it goes on to enumerate thirty-three roads in the State of Alabama, while but one post-road is established in this bill for the State of Indiana, two in Arkansas, four in California, one in Colorado, three in the State of New York, and so on.

We commenced generalizing a good many years ago and have been generalizing ever since, legislating indeed in the very direction of my amendment. About forty years ago Congress, by a sweeping enactment, provided that all the canals during the time the mail was carried thereon should be post-roads. This was done in 1826. In the year 1838 Congress enacted that all railroads, or parts of railroads, which were then or thereafter to be in operation, should be established as post-roads. At a still earlier date than that Congress enacted that all the waters of the United States, during the time the mail was carried thereon, should be post-roads. Then, again, at a much later date than I have mentioned, Congress enacted that all plank-roads, during the time the mail was carried thereon, should be post-roads; and within the last ten or twelve years Congress provided that all letter-carrier routes, established in any city or town for the collection and delivery of mail matter, should be post-roads. There are fifty-two cities in the United States, containing a population exceeding twenty thousand, where the free-delivery system exists at this present time, and by this little enactment of less than two lines every street in those fifty-two cities upon which the mail is carried from one to three or four times a day is erected by a law, in a general form, into a post-road.

Now, if we may thus legislate in relation to the streets of cities, in relation to plank-roads, in relation to railroads, in relation to the navigable waters of the United States, whereon the public mail is carried, why may we not in general form, as I propose in this amendment, provide that every road, be it State, county, or township, erected by competent authority in any State or Territory, shall be a post-road? Do we thereby declare that post-offices shall be established and the mail carried upon all these roads? By no means; for although there are nearly twenty thousand post-roads in this document, there are less than eight thousand post-routes of all descriptions in the United States at this time upon which the mail is carried. Let me in this connection refer to the recent report of the Postmaster-General. He says that at the end of the last fiscal year "of public mail-routes in operation there were seventy-four hundred and twenty-four" of all kinds; not the kind of post-roads that we are establishing here, but embracing railroads, plank-roads, canals, navigable waters, and public roads of all kinds upon which the mail was carried.

Mr. MORTON. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for information. I find that he makes a distinction between "routes" and "roads over which the mail is carried."

Mr. PRATT. I use the word in the Constitution. Congress, by the Constitution, is clothed with power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." I suppose that the term "post-road" instead of "post-route" should be used in all our legislation, because we are not authorized by the Constitution to establish post-routes, but we are authorized to establish post-roads and establish post-offices on them.

Mr. MORTON. My colleague spoke of there being some fifty thousand post-roads, and I forget the number of thousands of post-routes, where the mail was actually carried.

Mr. PRATT. I may have used the term "post-route" inconsiderately.

Mr. MORTON. No; I do not mean the mere phrase; but my colleague spoke about the number of post-routes on which the mail was carried being less than the number of post-roads established by law.

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; I was about reading from the report of the Postmaster-General. He says:

Of public mail-routes in operation——

I suppose he means by "routes" there "post-roads," because he is not authorized by any legislation that I know of to substitute the word "route" for "road."

Of public mail-routes in operation there were 7,424, aggregating in length 256,210 miles; in annual transportation 119,909,650 miles; and in annual cost, $13,635,341.

Then he proceeds to state that the service upon these post-routes was divided as follows:

Railroad routes: length 63,457 miles.

Let me pause right here for a moment. Instead of enumerating, as is done in this bill, the different railroads from time to time that shall be post-roads, upon which the mail shall be conveyed, we have by one sweeping clause of a dozen words declared that every railroad completed, or hereafter to be completed, shall be a post-road. Every railroad in the United States, by that little enactment, is erected into a post-road, and there are some 272 or 274 railroads in the United States upon which the mail is conveyed, and conveyed under this authority—establishing them, not by name, but by general description, as post-roads. The length of the railroad-routes is 63,457 miles, and the annual transportation 65,621,445 miles.

Now I come to steamboat-routes. The length of these is 16,762 miles, and the annual transportation 3,947,785 miles. "Other routes"—and that, I suppose, comprehends these dirt roads that we are to make post-routes of by this bill—"other routes upon which the mails are required to be conveyed with celerity, certainty, and security;" their length is given at 175,991 miles, and the annual transportation at 50,340,420 miles. Then follows the annual cost, and then follows the cost per mile under the different forms of service that I have enumerated—"railroads," "steamboats," and "other routes."

Mr. President, this is nearly all I have to say on this subject. I have offered this amendment in good faith, supposing that we might shorten this process, and get rid of a good deal of reading in our statute-book that is purely lumber, by just dispensing with this whole business of occupying in the two branches of Congress some three hundred and seventy-four men, upon two or three different occasions at every session of Congress, in enumerating name by name the different public highways throughout the country that shall be erected into post-roads. I shall be thankful to any Senator who will correct me if I am wrong in this matter. I have supposed that if we could generalize in relation to plank-roads and railroads and rivers, and get rid of their enumeration, we could do the same thing in relation to the ordinary highways of the country.

Why, sir, in this very document to which I have called the attention of the Senate there is an enumeration, one after another, of fifty different bridges that have been erected into post-roads at different times by authority of Congress, most of them over the Ohio, and the Mississippi, and the Missouri, and their tributaries—some over lakes, some over the mouths of lakes, as the case may be. Fifty of them are enumerated here. Why not provide, just as I do in my amendment, that all the bridges erected over navigable waters, whether rivers, lakes, or the outlets of lakes, or other bodies of water, be, and the same are hereby, made post-roads? Do we by that means provide that the Postmaster-General shall establish mail service upon them? Not at all. It does not follow by any means, after we have passed this bill and it has become a law, that he is going to establish mail service upon the routes that are thus established as post-roads. There is a general statute upon that subject, authorizing him, when the occasion shall require it, to cause the mail of the United States to be transported over these roads. You see that, notwithstanding the fifteen or twenty thousand roads that have been established here at different times, in point of fact the mail is carried over not one-fourth of them in number at this time; and I venture to say that the mail service will not be put upon one-fourth of the routes that are established in this bill.

I was not a little surprised the other day when my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, was interrogated on this subject. He was asked, "How do you get up these bills? Are you in the habit of inquiring into the necessity of these different post-roads? Are you in the habit of scrutinizing all the propositions that are offered, and ascertaining whether really the public interests, the public wants, demand the establishment of this or that post-road?" "O, no," was his reply, "not a bit of it; I take the word of the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Missouri, or the Senator from Michigan; whatever any Senator proposes as a new road goes into this bill, to be enacted into a law." Thus you perceive, Mr. President, since this is the case, and since under a general law the Postmaster-General is not going to put mail service upon any road that shall be established, either by enumeration, as in this bill, or by general law, unless the public wants demand it, where is the danger, where is the impropriety, of passing the amendment which I offer?

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, I do not think there is any occasion for so much excitement on this subject. It is a very simple matter. Many years ago these post-route bills were enacted. As long ago as your very first statute-book you will find among the collection of statutes of the United States a post-route bill. The country has gone on and prospered and extended itself to the Pacific Ocean, north almost to Hudson's Bay, and, south, has occupied all the country to the Gulf of Mexico. There has been no excitement about this subject in all these times; but suddenly the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] has stirred up the whole Senate, alarmed himself, and terrified even the Senator from Indiana. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, all the learning on this subject is found in the sixth chapter of the postal code enacted in June, 1872, in which Congress generalized this legislation, and said that all the canals of the country, all the navigable rivers on which steamboats run, all the railroads of the country, following the legislation of previous years, and grouping them all together, should be mail-routes; but it left outside of that the ordinary "dirt roads," as my friend from Indiana calls them, the ordinary country roads, as to which it seemed Congress still wished to reserve some kind of discretion out of this general classification. I cannot give any special reason for it except that they wanted, in regard to roads of this character, to retain the discretion in their own hands.

I have heard in the Post-Office Department one reason why all the roads of the country should not be made postal routes. They say that if that were done they would be importuned daily by parties who wished service on these roads; whereas now they are saved from that by these congressional enactments—that there is some little saving of annoyance to them in this method. That is one reason. But certainly through all the years of the history of this Government up to this day every road in the country has not been made a post-route. There must have been some reason for it in addition to the one which they have in the Post-Office Department.

My friend from Indiana differs diametrically on this subject from my friend from Maine. My friend from Maine thinks there are too many post-routes already, and my friend from Indiana thinks there are not enough. I think the medium course, pursued in the practice of the Government heretofore, and which the committee are now pursuing, is the safer one until some better reason can be shown for a departure from it.

I might also say, as the Senator from Indiana has suggested, and it will allay somewhat the fears of my friend from Maine, that not more than 20 or 25 per cent. of the routes authorized by law have service placed upon them; and that while this bill probably provides for five thousand miles of postal routes, probably service will not be placed on over twelve or thirteen hundred miles.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Post-Office Committee. I understand from him that if all these routes should be established by Congress, then the Department will be subjected to great annoyance from individuals to put service upon them?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If they are not put on, will not the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be subjected to great annoyance to have them put on, one by one; and is it worth while to continue that annoyance?

Mr. RAMSEY. I agree with the Senator that it would be better to put them on now than at another time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It will relieve the Senator from annoyance rather than the Department.

Mr. STEWART. There is no doubt in the world that if this suggestion of the Senator from Indiana had been made fifty years ago it would have been adopted. The only thing remarkable about it is, that we have gone along with these special bills thus far. There is no objection, and there never has been since I have been here, to the establishment of any post-route. Any clerk here, any correspondent, any page who suggests a post-route, can have it put on, as a matter of course, without any inquiry into it. The propriety of carrying the mail over it is to be adjudged by the Post-Office Department. Now, it frequently happens that after all these special routes are put in a post-route bill the Department do not get the best route between two given points to carry the mail upon, and it would be more convenient to go over a nearer route that has not been declared a post-route. Then you must wait until Congress meets and declares it a post-route before the Department can put service upon it, and leave off service upon half a dozen other routes which are unnecessary. But every time an application is made for a post-route it is put in this post-route bill. No question is made about it. The discretion is with the Department now to as great an extent as it would be if this general law were passed, and there is no reason in the world why it should not be. The only reason assigned is that the Post-Office Department would be more importuned. They would be no more importuned than they are now, but they would have a wider scope in which to exercise a wise discretion. If they could carry the mail over any public road in the country, they could leave off routes or put them on without waiting for the action of Congress, and undoubtedly would be able to economize the service; and that inconvenience will readily suggest itself to any one who has had anything to do with the frontier and the establishing of post-routes there. Post-routes have to be established and abandoned constantly. The Post-Office Department can arrange the matter themselves better than to await the arbitrary legislation of Congress. If this suggestion had been made fifty years ago, it would undoubtedly have been adopted, and I hope it will be adopted now. It is the most sensible thing I have heard in the line of the Post-Office Department for a long time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I doubt whether the adoption of this amendment would be a compliance with the Constitution which gives Congress the power to establish post-roads. The object then was, and I think that would be the interpretation put on that provision of the Constitution, that Congress might select roads in existence in the country and establish them as post-roads. I do not think it meant to give a sweeping power to Congress to make every highway in the land a post-road.

There is one other point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate; and that is, what may be the effect of adopting this provision declaring that every highway in this country shall be a post-road. Suppose, for instance, a highway is running between two towns in my State, and by a law of the State the location of that road shall be changed, or under some provision of the law the road should be vacated, the question arises in my mind whether the State would have power, under a special or general law, to vacate that road which had by an act of Congress been declared to be a post-road?

We had better not go into this legislation, at least until we look at some of the consequences that might possibly result from the adoption of a measure of this kind. There is certainly no necessity for it. It is known that nine-tenths of the public highways in this country never can be post-roads in fact. I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to offer an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Indiana. I am free to confess that the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is an improvement undoubtedly on the present method of doing things. My honorable friend from Minnesota, I think, will have to admit that on his own logic, because as at present advised, and according to the present method in regard to establishing these routes, they are established as a matter of course. We have seen that exhibited on the floor. The Senator from Minnesota comes in with a bill establishing post-routes for five or ten thousand miles—he does not know what number; nobody knows how many. It is difficult, perhaps, to understand the extent. When interrogated he thinks it is so much a matter of course that it is scarcely legislation. And yet, Mr. President, the Constitution authorizes Congress to establish post-roads. In the fact of establishing a post-road a presumption arises that a service hangs upon it; that a service is to follow. The question seems to be settled in the judgment of the Executive Department that Congress intended not only to establish a post-road but to establish a service; but the chairman of the committee concedes that not upon 25 per cent. of all the post-roads that have been established has a service been put. Why? That is a very sorry commentary upon the legislation of Congress; that is a very sorry commentary upon the discretion with which we exercise our powers here. It shows precisely, what my honorable friend from Minnesota admitted in the beginning, that these roads are established as a matter of course; that whenever this omnibus comes in whoever desires an amendment puts it on; no information is asked; none is required; it goes on as a matter of course. If that is so, and if that is to be the course of things, it is a great deal better, in my judgment, that we should dispense entirely with all this part of the duties of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Certainly there is no security whatever in it, and we shall come, in the end, precisely to the proposition which the honorable Senator from Indiana offers.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the Senator allow me, for his information, to read to him section 215 of the postal code, from which he will see that notwithstanding these routes are established by law, yet through all time the discretion has been reserved to the Postmaster-General whether or not service shall be placed upon them. This is the language:

That the Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. "As often." That relates to the frequency of the service. My honorable friend is not quite acute. I was aware of that, but I did not suppose my honorable friend would blunder into that.

Mr. RAMSEY. That knocks the argument of the honorable Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Why? I am talking about the establishment of post-roads, and my honorable friend reads something to me in regard to the frequency with which the service should be run. That shoots a little wide of the mark, allow me to say to my honorable friend. Now if we are to establish these post-roads as a matter of course, then let us establish them all at once; and I propose, not knowing what the temper of the Senate may be in that particular, and as I confess (although I do not quite agree to it) on the admissions of my honorable friend from Minnesota who has the special care of this service, I do not see how he is to object to it—I wish to perfect it or protect the service a little by an amendment which I offer, and which I assume that my honorable friend from Indiana will not object to:

Provided, That no service shall hereafter be ordered on the routes herein or hereafter established, until after an examination and report of an agent of the Post-Office Department, and in the judgment of the Postmaster-General such service is demanded by the public convenience and necessity.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, why does not the honorable Senator apply the same provision to the railroads of the country, and the plank-roads of the country, and the steamboat-routes of the country, that consume your postal revenues? Why apply it to all these little conveniences for the remote and rural population of the country? Why not so provide in regard to the routes that consume nine-tenths of the appropriation for transportation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say to the honorable Senator that that did not occur to me. Now, let the honorable Senator make that proposition and I will not object to it at all. Let him move it as an amendment, if he thinks that desirable. I have no objection to that. Let it apply to all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. RAMSEY. I might say, in addition to what I have said, that I have no doubt it would require the appointment of a great number of additional agents of the Post-Office Department to do this service. All they now have under the law are fully occupied. This service, probably, would require a duplication of the present number. That the Senate ought to contemplate if they vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BOGY. If I rightly understand the amendment of the Senator from Maine, it would take away from Congress virtually the power of creating these mail-routes and give the entire subject to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No. The Senator will allow me one moment. Congress now proposes to exercise the supreme power in making all the highways in the country post-roads. That establishes that fact. That provides for the service, I assume. This simply modifies the proposition to this extent, that no service shall be put upon a road, though it is a post-road, until the facts are examined into to show that the public convenience and necessity require it.

Mr. BOGY. It is of no use to have a post-route if mail service does not exist upon it. This amendment virtually gives the power to the Postmaster-General to have service or not on these routes; and it would have the effect, as I understand it, to take away from Congress the power. This amendment is germane to an amendment offered the other day by the Senator from Vermont, providing that all mail-routes which do not pay a certain proportion—I think one-half—of the expenses should be discontinued. This would have the effect of discontinuing, in my opinion, a great many routes.

Sir, although I am willing to grant that there are a great many routes which do not pay, yet the whole post-office system is a grand system, beneficent in its operation, calculated to strengthen this great empire, reaching from ocean to ocean, to spread the great principles of this Government, to enlarge the domain of the religion which our people profess. Everything that interests our people depends to a greater extent upon the Post-Office Department than upon any other Department of this Government. Although it may be true—and I know it is true in my own State, and I believe it is true also in the gentleman's State—that many routes do not pay their expenses, yet I should be unwilling to see one of these little routes stopped. If this service does cost the Government a few million dollars, what of it? It is for the benefit of the people. It is to enable them, not only to receive news from home, but to let them know what is being done by their Representatives in the Congress of the nation; and if there should be only one isolated Vermonter away in the valleys of Nevada, or in the crags of the Rocky Mountains, I would give him the opportunity of hearing from his native home now and then; and although it might cost this Government more money than it received to take him a letter from his old father or his old mother, let him get it. Another one will follow him from his native home, and so on, until a settlement is formed; and in that way your Western States have been built up from nothing to what they are now.

I hold that it is better to continue this system, and that more wisdom will be shown in doing that than in curtailing or crippling it. I attach no importance to expense in a case of this kind. I say that it is for the members of both Houses of Congress to designate what mail-routes are necessary, and they can exercise that power with a great deal more wisdom than the Postmaster-General. He does not know the country, to begin with. Then he is impelled, by the pride which all men in such a position have, to carry on his Department successfully with as little expense as possible. We, on the other hand, desire to accommodate the people, and although in carrying out that desire we may expend a little money, we are accommodating the people with their own money. I am for it on that ground. I do not agree that the post-office expenditure is so large as some would have us believe. It amounts to some $30,000,000 a year altogether. Look at the vast good flowing from it; look at the immense work done by that Department, with all its ramifications extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, from the northern line of Mexico to the forty-ninth parallel. Everywhere throughout this vast extent of country you find the mail-carriers of the United States carrying letters and newspapers. It is one of the grandest things that belong to this Government, and the amount of $30,000,000 a year is nothing at all in comparison to the importance of it.

I am perfectly willing to unite with any Senator in lopping off improper expenditures and in doing away with any laws which make the Post-Office Department a mere express, which I think it ought not to be. I would rather now vote to take away from the cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward the free delivery than to stop the smallest route in the western country. I do admit free delivery is a very great accommodation. I live in a city of four hundred and fifty thousand people where we have free delivery, and it is a matter of very great convenience; but that is all. It is not a matter of primary importance; it is a matter of convenience; and while we are spending a vast sum of money to accommodate a large number of people merely to promote their convenience, we are hesitating whether some little mail-route in the vast wilderness of the West should not be stopped because it does not pay. Stop your free delivery if you want to save expense, stop it immediately, and supply these routes that do not pay, but yet are promotive of the happiness of the people of our great interior country.

I did not intend to speak upon this matter, believing that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont offered a few days ago was virtually disposed of. The Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON] I think made a very good argument on that subject, and so did the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.] But this is the same measure in another light. In other words, the effect would be to do away with a great many routes, because as certain as the thing is done the Postmaster-General especially will stop one-half the little routes in the West, and I think the effect would be to stop fully one-half in my State. I am opposed to it.

Suppose the post-office service does cost twenty-five or thirty million dollars a year. We appropriated the other day $4,000,000—for what? Because the newspapers got up the cry of "war with Spain." When we passed that appropriation bill for $4,000,000 I voted in a minority of seven against it. We fling away millions of dollars profusely in matters which in themselves are of very doubtful expediency, and in matters of positive importance we are very careful to practice some economy. I hold that this whole idea of curtailing the utility or checking the rapid expansion of the Post-Office Department is wrong. Let it expand; let it go on; a few millions of dollars, I hold, are of no consequence if you will carry out the system properly and give the people the means of information.

Mr. SPENCER. This debate seems to be a protracted one, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me a word.

Mr. SPENCER. I will yield.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope my honorable friend from Indiana will see that my proposition is not at all adverse to his, and, if it is agreeable to him, I hope he will accept it.

Mr. PRATT. I have listened to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, and I am satisfied to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, then, is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator from Indiana to accept another amendment, to come in after the word "highways," in order to perfect the language, providing that the highways shall at least lead from town to town, or from village to village, so that we should not establish mails on cross-roads or interior roads where there is no possibility of ever having a mail-route.

Mr. PRATT. Let it be read. I think I shall be satisfied with it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In the last line but one, after the word "highways," I move to insert, "leading from one town to another, or from one village to another," so as to read:

And all public roads established or hereafter to be established in the States or Territories, by competent authority, and used as public highways, leading from one town to another, or from one village to another, be, and the same are hereby, established post-roads.

Mr. RAMSEY. Now I desire to call the attention of Senators who are interested in the navigation of the Mississippi, the Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, to the character of this amendment. It makes any bridge built upon any of these rivers, however destructive to commerce it may be, a highway and postal route, and gives it a legal character. I imagine Congress wants to reserve a question of that kind to itself.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to further state an objection to the amendment last offered. It is very well known that the railroads running through the West have little stations, which can neither be called towns or villages, where the mail is thrown off to be carried to some town or village in the distance by a lateral road. This amendment will prevent the employment of any such roads in existence, or that may hereafter grow up. In itself it is destructive of any growing of the postal service. I object to it for that reason.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is full of mischief.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to it because hereafter we shall be compelled to have a special mail-route bill passed through Congress in order to distinguish those roads which start from railroads at railroad connections where there may be neither a town nor a village, nothing but a simple station where passengers get on and off, and trace them back to the town, and again back from the town to the railroad, so that really we do not get rid of the annual mail-route bill under this amendment. In other words, we should have to build towns before we could have railroads.

Mr. MORTON. It has occurred to me that this amendment, declaring so many roads, and bridges, and rivers post-routes, the intention of which is to dispense with the necessity of legislation in each particular case, is virtually placing the whole power in the hands of the Postmaster-General; that it gives to him the power to indefinitely extend the service without consulting Congress. We, in general terms, make all the roads, rivers, and highways post-routes, and then the Postmaster-General is authorized to put service upon them. It seems to me that it is in the nature of abdicating the power on the part of Congress and conferring it on the Postmaster-General. It occurs to me that it should be a matter of legislation on the part of Congress as to whether a particular road shall be a post-road—that the judgment of Congress should be given upon that. But if we make them all post-roads, and then leave the whole matter to the Postmaster-General, is it not abdicating that power, which the Constitution intended to repose in Congress?

Mr. MERRIMON. I make the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to make that motion, because the Senate is evidently disposed to adjourn. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio and the Senator from North Carolina move that the pending bill be laid aside, and that the Senate resume the consideration of the finance resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from North Carolina having the floor, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 20, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMERCE BY RAILROAD AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. McCRARY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is understood that this bill is not to be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. McCRARY. Certainly not. The committee instructed me to recommend the passage of the bill. But as that is not now in order I have asked that it be printed and recommitted. I submit also a report in writing upon the same subject, which I move be printed to be laid upon the tables of members.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Railways and Canals relative to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States.

BLUE BOOK.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate bill No. 215 in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill provides that in lieu of the number of copies of the Biennial Register now authorized by law to be printed, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to cause to be printed fifteen hundred copies of said work.

Mr. DONNAN. One word in explanation. The book referred to in the Senate bill is not a book for popular distribution. I am aware that the volumes of the book heretofore published have been severely criticised by members on this floor, and I do not know but with justice; for in some respects I know they have been inaccurate. But the committee are inclined to believe that the present one will be found more accurate. The necessity for the number of copies provided by this bill is this: to supply members of Congress each with one copy, and also the officials in the Executive Departments of the Government with one copy each for their great convenience. The Secretary of the Interior makes the following statement in regard to it:

The law authorizes the printing of only seven hundred and fifty copies, which the experience of the last few years has shown are insufficient to supply the members of Congress and officials in the Executive Departments, who really need this book, finding, as they do, that it is a valuable aid in the transaction of the public business; and this increase in the number of copies to be furnished is the more necessary now as the House of Representatives is much larger than formerly.

The Committee on Printing of the last Congress added one thousand to the usual number, which has enabled the Department to reserve enough to furnish the new members of the present Congress; but if the supply be now doubled, that is, adding seven hundred and fifty more, it will be amply sufficient to meet the demand.

Members will see that this bill proposes to print two hundred and fifty copies less than was printed before. But it is believed that the number here called for will be sufficient to supply the demand, as I suggested a few moments ago.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the number, fifteen hundred, be sufficient to give every member of Congress a copy, as well as each of the officials of the Departments?

Mr. DONNAN. The Secretary of the Interior so states. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNERS.

Mr. WELLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1386) to extend the provisions and limitations of an act limiting the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1851; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1387) to equalize pensions in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. HOLMAN called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called for, the morning hour commences at twelve o'clock and nineteen minutes. At the conclusion of the morning hour last Thursday the call rested with the Committee on the Rules.

SUSPENSIONS OF THE RULES.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Rules to report the following, and recommend that it be adopted by the House:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the House:

RULE —. All motions to suspend the rules, except to go into Committee of the Whole, shall, before being submitted to the House, be seconded by a majority, as in the case of the previous question.

This is the same rule that was reported from the committee a few days since, and after a very considerable discussion was recommitted. Since that time gentlemen on both sides of the House have appealed to different members of the committee to reconsider the matter, and to report it again. In accordance with that sentiment, the committee have again considered the subject, and have instructed me to report it. As the matter was very fully discussed the other day, and supposing the House understands it now just as well as it will ever understand it, I will demand the previous question, and test the sense of the House on that demand.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that will not be done on so important a rule. I understand it is not the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will ask the previous question to test the sense of the House upon this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn. Let us have some little time for reflection.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I have already stated that this proposition was presented the other day——

Mr. STORM. I object to debate, unless the question is to be open to debate all around.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not propose to discuss the question now; but I wish to say that after the full discussion on this subject the other day, members must have made up their minds one way or the other, and are just as ready now to vote upon the question as they will be after a prolonged debate.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman does not wish to stop all of to-day's legislation. An important change in the standing rules of this House, affecting not only private but public interests, should not be allowed to pass without some discussion. I for one shall oppose, by every legitimate and proper mode, the consideration of every other question until we have had an opportunity to ventilate this proposed change in the rules.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am very well aware that if the gentleman and any considerable number acting with him are so disposed they can work a practical delay. I do not wish to place the House or myself in that attitude. I made my suggestion, believing that we had heard very fully indeed from the gentleman and from various other members. If, however, gentlemen suppose that they can throw further light upon this question, if they desire to put themselves right on the record by further debate, and will indicate how much time they desire, I will try to oblige them. I do not wish to "crowd anything down," to adopt the expression we sometimes hear.

Mr. HOLMAN. We insist that this proposed rule does in fact violate the spirit of the Constitution with reference to the rights of one-fifth of the members of the House. It virtually takes away a very important constitutional guarantee.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman indicate how much time he desires?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will allow so fundamental a change in the administration of the affairs of this House to be debated as long as gentlemen think proper to speak upon it. Such a question as this is not apt to consume more time than gentlemen feel the merits of the case require.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman indicate how much time he himself would like to speak?

Mr. HOLMAN. Only a few minutes myself.

Mr. MAYNARD. How many?

Mr. HOLMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes most cheerfully.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that by the Constitution of the country a given number of members of this House are entitled to require a record by a yea and nay vote upon questions coming before us; and that any measure tending to impair this right is not simply invading this constitutional provision, but the effect of it is to destroy the responsibility of the House of Representatives to the people. I hold, sir, that any measure which may destroy the responsibility of Representatives on this floor to the people themselves is destructive to that extent of the very form of government under which we live. Responsibility to the people is a fundamental principle of representative government. The record of the votes of representatives upon public measures is a matter of the very first importance. It is important not simply to the majority, but also to the minority, that our constituents should have a record of the action of their Representatives upon the various great questions of public concern coming up here for action.

I protest against this proposition as an invasion of the rights of the minority, as an unconstitutional measure, and one in the interest of the plundering schemes which have from time to time been sought to be rushed through this House in the closing hours of the session. I affirm, and every gentleman who has had experience on this floor will attest the truth of the position, that our right to have the yeas and nays taken upon the demand of one-fifth of the members has done more to prevent hasty and unwise legislation, and the depletion of the Treasury by unjust claims, than any other rule of proceeding that we could establish. The Treasury has been protected; a record has been made upon all important questions; and yet the public business, so far as my experience extends, has not been improperly delayed by the action of this constitutional rule.

I trust that the majority will see the impolicy of ingrafting upon our rules a provision so arrogant, so oppressive, and so unjust. Every gentleman must see the effect of such a proposition. We can only desire such a rule as this if we desire to escape responsibility to our constituents for our acts. If such is not our desire, then there is no need for the adoption of the proposition. Every gentleman who is in favor of proper responsibility of the Representative to his constituency will insist that the rule which has stood unchallenged for half a century shall still continue to be the rule of the House.

Gentlemen insist that the majority have not the control of the House. I remember no instance of it. Our present rule, which allows only a single motion to adjourn in certain cases, is the only guarantee which is required. The majority always have control of the House. They have always had control of the House. The majority is always sustained by the Speaker on all matters coming before the House for action. It seems to me strange, now, that a majority of the House will insist on so completely crushing out the rights of the minority to be heard before the country by this only valuable mode of being heard, and that is by recording their votes by the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire for a moment to discuss this rule. When it was first introduced it struck my mind unfavorably; I thought it might be open to the objection stated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN;] but when I reflected that every representative body in the United States, every political convention from the time of the earliest conventions of the democratic party, has always made for itself a similar rule as a protection against questions being sprung upon it without deliberation, I likened this rule to that, and I think it ought to pass. Every political convention at first passes a rule that all resolutions of principle shall be submitted to a committee on resolutions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts adopt the same rules for an organized body like the House of Representatives, which ought to be held directly responsible to the people—would the gentleman apply the same rule to such a body, where there are always two parties, that he would apply to a political convention of one party, where only a certain result is aimed at without reference to the machinery by which that resolution is to be secured?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I never happened to get into a political convention where there were not two parties inside of it—two different wings of the same party. [Laughter.]

What has been found necessary to protect the well-being of a party is equally necessary to protect the well-being of every representative body in the country. For this reason it only requires propositions shall not be sprung upon the House by which any man must commit himself one way or the other, and be open to be misunderstood and misinterpreted, and have his opinion go out to the country without having had any sort of consideration of the question. I wish to illustrate for a moment. Yesterday I had to vote "no" against a resolution about the franking privilege, because, in my judgment, it did not go far enough. It was not sufficiently considered; the resolution had not been carefully drawn and would not reach the object which the mover intended. Last Monday how was it? On the great question of finances a gentleman got up here, without any consideration by the House, and offered, under a motion to suspend the rules, a resolution by which the House was put in the attitude of having apparently voted three or four different ways on the same proposition. It was because cunning propositions were brought in to catch this or that vote, and we were disgraced, in my judgment, by our votes last Monday; it was because men did not choose to allow their votes to be misinterpreted. Whereas on the great questions of finance there should be the most careful consideration; no man ought to be made to commit himself on any great question by the crude notion of any other man who brings in a resolution declaring an opinion. If any gentleman came to me and insisted on my answering his question on any such proposition, or on great questions, without a moment's consideration, forcing me to record my opinions without any reflection, have I not a right, as between man and man, to say, "It is none of your business?" And now, when in this House, by a simple motion to suspend the rules, men put to us the highest propositions of political science, the highest questions of administrative policy, on which, in the face of the country, without a moment's pause, we are compelled to declare our opinions, and declare them in the most solemn form, has not the House the same right to protect itself against them?

My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says that this rule will aid the plunder schemes which are sometimes put through the House. I beg his consideration on that subject. If a majority without a yea and nay vote could pass such a scheme, then he would be right. But all the majority can do under the proposed rule is to say that they will submit it to a two-thirds vote of the House or they will not submit it; either it shall not pass, or it only shall pass by a vote of two-thirds of the House. It is not to aid affirmative legislation at all. It does not affirm any legislation; it does not act on any legislation; it does not promote legislation; but it is a check on improvident legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the effect of the existing rule.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And that is exactly what I want. We want to stop plunder schemes.

Mr. HOLMAN. But this rule is not a check on legislation. The rule as it now stands is a constitutional check, and maintains the constitutional right of having the yeas and nays put on record on the call of one-fifth of the members of the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me. When any question is on its passage, then every man has the right, or ought to have the right, to have his name recorded on a yea and nay vote. But on the question whether it come before the House until considered by some committee, I do not understand that he has any constitutional privilege to demand a yea and nay vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not. But by this rule you defeat the constitutional right of being put upon record by a yea and nay vote.

The gentleman wants that the majority shall have the power of preventing a record being made.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A record made on what? On anything that is to pass or fail? O, no. On a question of the order of business, one whether a majority shall say that they think it ought then to be considered. That is all.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts misapprehended the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and has not answered his suggestion. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, as I understand it, is that in any given case where the House is called upon to act he should have the privilege, if one-fifth of the House demand it, of recording his vote by a call of the yeas and nays. Now, then, supposing a motion to be made for a suspension of the rules, under the rule which it is proposed to adopt, it must be seconded by a majority of the House, or else it is not a pending question upon which the yeas and nays can be called in the House. If the rule prevailed that on a motion to suspend the rules the seconding of that motion should be taken by the yeas and nays, then we would not be deprived of our right under the constitutional provision. But here is a silent vote, a vote by standing, or by the uplifted hand, or by the voice, unrecorded, on whether the question can come before the House as a pending question on which the yeas and nays can be called.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It has been so, sir, exactly, in the case of the previous question. That is a matter on which the yeas and nays have never been called from the earliest time. But the previous question does not pass anything. The only question on the previous question is, will the House pass to its consideration? and the yeas and nays have never been taken on the previous question. And so in regard to this rule the question is, will the House pass to the consideration of the motion which has been submitted to the House under a two-thirds vote? Precisely as in the case of the previous question the point before the House is, will the House pass to its consideration? and they should stand alike and are alike. On the one question the point is whether the measure shall pass by a majority; on the other, it is whether it shall pass by a two-thirds vote under a suspension of the rules. There is no other difference. The House says in the one case, we second the previous question—that is, we will proceed to vote on the pending question, and pass it by a majority. Under a suspension of the rules the House says only, we will or we will not proceed to the pending question, which must pass by a two-thirds vote; and it is no more an interference with the constitutional right of any citizen in the one case than in the other.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right in this line?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman says the seconding of the previous question does not pass anything, as it does not; but if the seconding of the previous question is voted down by a silent vote, is not the proposition just as effectually killed as though it were on a yea and nay vote? If it is voted up, it does not pass anything; but if it is voted down, is not that the end of the proposition just as much as if it were voted down directly?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is the end of the proposition in that shape; but it may be renewed in another shape or another form.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. And the previous question voted down again, so that a silent vote squelches it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It may do so; but it does not do it any more effectually than it does when the House says that it cannot be submitted to a two-thirds vote. How did it operate yesterday? We voted on two or three things which were mere matters of theoretical politics; and to prevent those things being sprung in the House, the only protection that the majority of the House had was to adjourn. So we adjourned about three o'clock, or at that hour we began to vote on the question of adjournment; and that is the only protection that the majority of the House have. And I observed that to protect themselves, a majority of my political friends on the other side of the House voted also to adjourn. I believe indeed that the motion came from that side of the House. They even did not desire to be brought up to a test vote on political questions without any consideration.

I repeat again that it has been found necessary in all deliberative assemblies—and I especially call attention to old democratic conventions—to protect themselves, so as to prevent any matter being sprung upon the convention without consideration, by adopting a rule that all propositions should be referred to a committee on resolutions without debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman answer one question? The Constitution says:

> Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

Now does not this proposed amendment deprive the House of the right to take a vote by yeas and nays on a proposition to suspend the rules without the consent of a majority of the House? I ask the gentleman that question, and I ask him, further, if that is in accordance with the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Indiana now allow me to ask him a question, and it is this: does he hold that the previous question is a question within the constitutional provision? If he does, then it comes within the clause of the Constitution to which he has referred, and has not the action of the House in seconding the previous question been, from the adoption of the Constitution down to the present time, a breach of the Constitution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not say that it has been a breach of the Constitution, but I will say that the Constitution contemplates the making of a record on every question brought before the House; and this rule is intended to impair that right and to deprive a minority of the right of calling the yeas and nays on a proposition without the consent of the majority.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will my friend think on this question in this light: first, that every House ought to make its own rules, and we have made a rule for a suspension of our rules under certain circumstances. Our rules provide how business shall be brought before the House, and this bringing up business before the House under a motion to suspend the rules is only one mode that the House provides. It is a mode by which business brought before the House may be passed by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MELLISH. Will it not, at least indirectly, obstruct the operation of the constitutional provision giving to one-fifth of the House the power to call for the yeas and nays? I think the yeas and nays should be recorded as often as possible.

Mr. MAYNARD. I resume the floor, and yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to allow me a moment to answer the question which has been put to me.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] asked if this rule did not infringe the constitutional provision in regard to the yeas and nays. I ask him if it infringes it any more than does the rule providing that the question on seconding the previous question shall be silently voted on?

Mr. POTTER. I desire first, Mr. Speaker, to acknowledge the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] in allowing me to be again heard in reference to this proposed amendment of the rules, because when the measure was last before the House I spoke most earnestly against it and insisted that it should be recommitted to the committee. It comes before us now substantially in the same form as before, and I cannot find now more than before sufficient reasons in its favor.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has referred to the condition of things which prevails here on every Monday morning when gentlemen rise in their places and offer, under motions to suspend the rules, propositions in respect of which no man on this floor should decide on the instant. In some cases, too, they attach preambles to their resolutions, preambles which are most absolutely true, while the resolutions appended are entirely objectionable. When I first came here, sir, I was somewhat troubled about such propositions, but I have become satisfied what my duty is, and I never now hesitate to record my vote against any proposition which may be wrong, no matter how good the preamble which may lead up to it. The practice is, I concede, an abuse and an evil, but it does not, after all, mislead the country or do very much harm. We have, to be sure, during this very session, seen the House upon a Monday putting itself, by the adoption of conflicting resolutions, in two or three different positions on the same day, each one inconsistent with the others. But such votes only have the effect of showing the country how little the buncombe action of the House on Mondays amounts to. Thus it is an evil that largely cures itself. For myself I shall be glad to see the whole power of suspending the rules upon Mondays abolished; but if it is to be retained then I think it safer on the whole to retain it as it is than as now proposed to be changed.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has urged that this change in the rule would secure us against the evils to which I have referred, and of which he justly complains. He resents the impertinent or improper questions sometimes asked of him, and of all members of this House, by those who may be able to obtain the floor upon a Monday to move a suspension of the rules. But under the proposed rule he would escape such a question only when asked by the minority; but whenever a majority chose to second the motion he would be put to answering it, however improper or impertinent he might deem it, just as much as he now is. That is an evil which we must meet while suspension of the rules is permitted. But to pass this proposed rule would be to sometimes deprive the minority of this House of the right to record their votes by yeas and nays upon questions submitted to it, while it would not equally take away the right of the majority. In short, the difficulty I see in this proposed change is that it will take from the minority, for the time being, the right to have the yeas and nays recorded upon any proposition submitted to the House for its consideration, under suspension of the rules, unless a majority of the House approve the proposition. It may, sir, be just as important sometimes to the minority of the House—nay, it may be just as important to the country itself—that the whole House should be obliged to record its opinion, judgment, and vote upon a proposition to which the majority for the time being are opposed as to have the votes of the House recorded only upon propositions for which the majority for the time being are in favor.

Indeed, I am, in any view of this subject, disposed to hesitate long before giving my consent to the change of a rule that has been in operation without question for more than fifty years. It is true that in other political bodies, party and legislative both, the rules are, in this respect, different. But the rules in this House have been of gradual growth, and are largely for the purpose of protecting the rights of minorities. They have been the result of the experience of the people of this country, changing as parties have changed in their control of this House. By that experience it has been found that the interests of the people were best served by most largely protecting the rights of minorities. And it is because the rule has so long existed in the interest of minorities that I am unwilling now to change it without some more controlling reason than any that has been suggested for the change.

If, Mr. Speaker, you go back to the Convention which framed the Constitution and look at the debates upon the clause securing to one-fifth of the House a record of the yeas and nays, you will find it nowhere suggested that the object of the provision was to preserve a record upon measures that a majority of the House might be in favor of. On the contrary, the object was to secure to one-fifth of the House, when they desired it, a record of the decision of every member of the House upon the question before it—as well upon those measures that did not pass as upon those that did pass.* Therefore I am unwilling now and here, for mere convenience of legislation, if it should be for such convenience, to change a rule so long and so well established.

I desire, besides, to repeat what I said the other day, that except upon great measures of supplies, and other measures as to which congressional legislation is a necessity, I am opposed to facilitating legislation by Congress. As regards all local and special and private measures we legislate too much now; and for that reason I am also opposed to any change in the rules which will facilitate that sort of legislation.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] for a few minutes.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, if I believed the objections raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and by my colleague [Mr. POTTER] to this proposed amendment of the rules were well founded, in that the proposed amendment was either an infringement upon the just rights of a minority or a substantial violation of the provisions of the Constitution, I certainly should not be found advocating or sustaining it. But I believe the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana arises from a misapprehension of the true effect of this proposed amendment of the rules.

The rules of a legislative body are adopted and adhered to for the protection of minorities; that I understand to be one of their principal objects. It is in the suspension of the rules at the beck of a large majority that the greatest danger to the substantial rights of minorities exists. Therefore any action by which the House shall reserve to the majority the control of the question of the suspension of the rules seems to me not to be an invasion of the rights of the minority, as not tending, even, towards a hasty, improper, or unreasonable suspension of the rules, but in the opposite direction.

As to the constitutional objection raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] it seems to me to be mainly without foundation. This House, by its rules, has already provided at what times motions for a suspension of the rules may be entertained, and at those times only can such motions be entertained. Is it going any further to annex an additional condition, and say that on Mondays, after the morning hour, provided a majority of the House shall by a division assent to it, the rules may be suspended?

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to ask this question: the gentleman makes a motion under the rules of the House to suspend the rules, and to put a measure upon its passage. Now, is not that in fact the question before the House? And should not one-fifth of the members have a right to call for a record upon that question?

Mr. HALE, of New York. If it gets before the House, and not otherwise. Suppose the gentleman from Indiana to-day rises and moves a suspension of the rules for a certain purpose: has he a right, even with the assent of one-fifth of the members present, to have a record by yeas and nays upon that motion? Certainly not, because the rules of the House forbid it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the entertaining of the motion to suspend the rules make it a question before the House?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Undoubtedly, and that is the point. Shall not the House reserve to itself, on Mondays, the same right to determine, without a call of the yeas and nays, whether it will entertain a motion to suspend the rules, as the House now has the right to say that on other days a motion to suspend the rules shall not be entertained? It is not a question before the House until entertained in conformity with the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would not the majority always be able to prevent any question coming before the House upon which a record could be made?

Mr. HALE, of New York. This proposed amendment is simply that the majority of the House shall have the power to prevent a question being brought before the House in violation of its rules, and for the purpose of abrogating its rules. I submit it is not an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. POTTER. I desire my colleague to answer me this question. Would it not be within the power of the majority of the House to prevent the yeas and nays being taken upon every question that did not command the vote of a majority of the House?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Plainly not.

Mr. POTTER. Plainly so.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Only where the rules are sought to be suspended for that purpose. It is only where there is an attempt to bring a question before the House in violation of the rules, by suspending them, by doing away with all rules, that under this rule the House proposes to reserve to itself the question whether it will entertain the motion. I submit that the experience of the House on every Monday that we have been in session, indicates the wisdom of the amendment now proposed. There has not been a single Monday when propositions have not been put before the House on a yea and nay vote, which numerous members have felt that they could not vote upon without liability to misconstruction. I do not believe the majority of the House ought to be subjected to an application in that form for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MAYNARD. I resume the floor, and yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this proposed amendment of the rules is principally upon the ground that in my judgment it is calculated more completely to place the minority under the control of the majority. It is a well-settled principle, and generally understood, that the rules of parliamentary bodies are made for the protection of minorities. By the adoption of this rule the minority of this House will be placed absolutely within the control of a majority, and that majority will not be required to make a record of its action.

It is true, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that under this proposed rule the majority of the House can at any time present a question to the House, require the yeas and nays, and place members upon the record; whereas the minority, under no circumstances where this amendment applies, can obtain the yeas and nays at all. If the majority desire a record it can have it, but the minority will have no opportunity whatever to make a record.

The seconding of the motion to suspend the rules will be, like the vote for the previous question, silent and unrecorded. It is, I submit, a cowardly shirking of the responsibility of your own acts. It shows an unwillingness to meet any and all questions that may arise, and let the people know your opinions upon current topics. As for myself, I wish the yeas and nays might be recorded upon every vote in this House; no better prevention against loose and hasty legislation could be devised; certainly the right to have them recorded should not be abridged.

Why do gentlemen desire the adoption of this rule? Is it—can there be—any reason other than that they may control more completely the minority; that they can, under it, make a record when they choose, yet prevent us from putting them on record when we would? It is really refreshing when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] tells us he is advocating this new rule in the interest of the minority. We ought certainly to be very grateful to him; and certainly for him to be found in the interests of the minority of this House is a new rôle for him to play. But I think we can understand our own interest quite as well as he, and, since he loves us so much, should be glad if he would allow us to determine it for ourselves.

But if it be not to place the minority in a position to be more easily handled by the majority, what purpose is to be subserved by this proposition? There is not much time lost on Mondays in the votes which are taken on suspending the rules. Why should not the minority, as well as the majority, have the right to require by the constitutional number (one-fifth of the House) a record by yeas and nays? This amendment does, in my judgment, deprive the minority of this constitutional right. The majority can, by concert of action, spring upon the House any question or proposition which they see fit, and force the minority to record their votes upon it, however absurd or however untruthful the proposition may be. Why should not the minority have the same privilege? Why should not we have the opportunity of putting conundrums to our friends of the other side as well as they to us? This would be only fair play, only simple justice. Our propositions or conundrums would probably be no more difficult or troublesome for them than theirs for us. But I insist there is no necessity for this amendment, there is no propriety in it; there is no object to be attained, unless it be more fully to place the minority within the control and management of the majority. The power of the majority, by force of numbers, is now absolute in this Congress and cannot be otherwise. It ought certainly to be enough that you can, at any time and on any question, suspend the rules without binding us down by a new rule.

*The Constitution provides for "the yeas and nays on any question," not on the passage of a measure. The provision in this respect corresponds with that in the report of the committee on detail in the Convention which adopted the Constitution. The debate in the Convention on the provision was confined to Mr. Gouverneur Morris's proposition that any member might call the yeas and nays; which he urged on the ground that the small States would otherwise be at a disadvantage, and find it difficult to get the one-fifth of the House necessary. This proposition Mr. Randolph seconded. Mr. Sherman objected that the yeas and nays never did any good, and so Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Gorham thought. Colonel Mason liked the section as it stood, as a middle way between the two extremes, and so the section stood.

Mr. DAWES. I ask to occupy a few moments on this question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am appealed to by so many gentlemen who wish to speak, that I think I must take the sense of the House upon the question whether it will terminate the debate.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say a few words.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman has appealed to me, and so have divers others, including one of his colleagues. I do not wish to be discourteous, but I must decline to yield further.

Mr. DAWES. I submit to my friend that a proposition, the purpose of which, as stated here, is to devise ways to avoid an expression of opinion, should not be put through by him under the previous question, without allowing anybody on this side, who differs from him, to put that difference on the record. Not only does the gentleman from Tennessee propose to put through this device to avoid a record, but he will not permit a man on this side of the House to express his dissent. I submit it is not quite fair for the gentleman, when we have a two-thirds majority on this side, to refuse to permit those on this side who happen to differ with him from putting their opinions on record.

Mr. MAYNARD. On that point, if there is any gentleman in the House who, when he has the floor in his own right, is more peremptory—to use no harsher expression—than the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I am not aware who he is. But if my demand for the previous question is seconded, and the main question ordered, I will, under the rules, having reported this resolution from the committee, have an hour to close debate, and I will cheerfully give to the gentleman from Massachusetts an opportunity to say what he thinks deserves to be said on this occasion.

Mr. DAWES. I do not object to that, but the gentleman indicated, as I thought, that he did not intend to give me any opportunity to express my opinion on this resolution.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee not to hasten the vote on this matter. There are other gentlemen besides the gentleman from Massachusetts on this side of the House who are strongly opposed to this invasion, and while perhaps they cannot throw any light on the subject, they do wish to have an opportunity to put themselves right upon the record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have agreed to allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] to submit a verbal amendment.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I also desire to appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee to allow me to be heard on this proposition. I have never asked to be heard on any subject here before, and I do not know that I ever shall again.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to say that under the rules of the House I will have under my command, after the previous question has been seconded, an hour, with which I will be liberal, if I know what liberality is, and will yield the time freely to the numerous gentlemen who desire to be heard. I do not think it is necessary for the intelligence of the House to take up the whole of this day's session in debating a resolution of this kind. But before making the demand for the previous question there is a verbal amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] which I will allow to be pending. It is this: instead of the words "to go into Committee of the Whole," he proposes to substitute the words "where they may be suspended by a majority."

Mr. SPEER. Is it in order for the gentleman making the report to accept any amendment to that report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Tennessee accepts the amendment, but only allows it to be pending.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 96.

So the demand for the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I differ with great reluctance with the committee who have reported this rule, and regret that I feel compelled to force myself upon the attention of the House in opposition. When this report was before the House on a previous occasion I refrained from expressing any views against it. I thought I might be mistaken in the force and effect of the rule, and I listened silently to the reasons for it. I have thought on it considerably since, and have been greatly strengthened in the opposition which I then felt to this measure. I wish merely to state my reasons without any passion; and I regret that I misunderstood the gentleman from Tennessee in supposing he intended to prevent that expression.

Sir, we propose to change a rule that has existed in the House from its foundation. Until this session of Congress I never heard its wisdom questioned. We propose to change this rule when we ourselves have more than a majority of two-thirds. I know it does not follow, because it has been the rule ever since the foundation of this House, that it is a wise one. It does not follow, but I am inclined to think a rule which is a pestiferous one would have caused some complaint, and there would have been an effort to have it amended before we got into such absolute control of the House. With this majority of two-thirds, with the country more sensitive than it ever was in the world as to our opinions, holding the House of Representatives to a stricter accountability for everything it does at this moment than ever before, we of the majority propose a rule which my colleague, with that frankness with which he debates every subject, openly avows, if I understand him aright, has for its object to prevent our recording our names upon disagreeable subjects.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ill-considered.

Mr. DAWES. Ill-considered; of course that means subjects which a majority of this House deem ill-considered. Therefore it is that we are asked to adopt the rule under these circumstances, when we have this absolute control, so that we can prevent any ill-considered legislation if we desire it, and any uncomfortable legislation if we desire it. It is not to protect us against legislation; but the object of it is to protect us against recording our names upon what my colleague says are subjects which a majority on our side have ill considered.

Now I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is an unfortunate time to propose such a rule as this. I agree with my colleague that we are often called upon to vote for ill-considered and incompatible measures. But this rule covers well-considered as well as ill-considered measures; comfortable as well as uncomfortable questions. This rule gives to a majority of our side of the House a power of preventing a record upon any political question, upon any matter of legislation whatever, that may come from the minority of this House. My colleague likens it to the proceedings of a political convention. Now, it does not commend itself to me to regard in that light the House of Representatives, once at least if not now a deliberative body, all whose acts we provide shall be recorded in the permanent records, and the Constitution saying that one-fifth of us shall have the power upon all questions of insisting that all our names shall be recorded upon any question which is submitted in order to the House; any question that is proper for legislation, or any question that one-fifth of the House shall deem to be proper. But without regard to the constitutional question, is it proper for us, as a question of policy, to exhibit ourselves here in this House, with more than a two-thirds majority, devising means to relieve ourselves from going on the record whenever upon any question a majority of our own friends shall deem it impolitic to record our names for any motive whatever, and declaring that it will be enough for the majority of our side of the House to say "We will not permit your names to be recorded on that question?"

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not want to interrupt my colleague; but perhaps just here he will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. DAWES. In a moment. I have been in the same position as my colleague in reference to questions in this House. I do not mean to intimate that my colleague has any more motive than any other gentleman in the House to avoid recording his vote. I think he has a kind of pleasure in showing the House and the country that he will act out his convictions, whatever they may be, and therefore I do not wish to be interpreted as meaning any such thing. But my colleague was frank enough to put upon the records of the House just the very reasons why I could not vote for this, when he said, as I have already stated, that the object of it was to prevent us being troubled, as he was yesterday, upon a question which he thought was so difficult for everybody else to understand that he was compelled to vote "nay" upon it. I only take that as an illustration—that is all.

Therefore it is, Mr. Speaker, that I take this position, although with the greatest reluctance and without being troubled about the constitutional question; because this has reference to modes of getting at the question, and there are other modes of getting at it. But I am influenced by the fact known to the world, that we stand here with all power in our hands to prevent any legislation, and therefore the whole country knowing that it is not to prevent legislation that we adopt this rule, but for the very purpose avowed here on this floor, that we may not be troubled with questions on which a majority on our side would, on the whole, a little rather not record their votes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is my turn now. And I ask my colleague to answer in all frankness if he did not vote to adjourn yesterday at three o'clock, or about that hour, for the purpose of getting rid of the day in which these motions could be made?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did; and I recorded my name before the country, showing that I voted to adjourn rather than have any more of these questions brought up.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And thereby we lost half a day.

Mr. DAWES. If my colleague will allow me a word, without offense to him, I will say that I did not skulk under any rule which would relieve me from recording my vote. I do not use that expression with any reference to my colleague.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You only skulked under the motion of adjournment. Nor do I use the word offensively.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I regard the rule which the committee have reported as one in favor of free debate, and extending greater privileges to the minority of this House than they have now. If the minority do not want it, then I am not willing to force it upon them.

Several MEMBERS on the right of the Chair. We do not want it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I see they do not seem to want it now, but before the session closes they will.

Mr. Speaker, since I have been here we have had a two-thirds majority on the republican side of the House during more than one session; and always, whenever any gentleman on our side got up with a bill, say like the civil-service bill, with amnesty put in it, or something of that kind, the gentlemen in the minority got up and asked for the privilege of debate. When the appropriation of land to the Northern Pacific Railroad was before the House, the gentlemen opposed to it said, "Give us a chance to be heard; give us debate;" and they used to move to adjourn, and to adjourn to a certain day, and filibuster all day, until Monday was gone. The members on our side thought that we had not got quite power enough; that the minority, I mean now the political minority of the House, had this constitutional right to filibuster, and we could not therefore force down their throats whatever they did not want without giving them a chance to say a word, and we must force them with a little more stringent rule. We got up a rule, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] leading in its advocacy at the time, providing that after one motion to adjourn had been made they should be brought to a vote on the pending question without a word of debate.

Now, a gentleman on the other side gets up and introduces bills and resolutions which have been before no committee, and about which he has consulted nobody, approved by nobody but himself, embracing, perhaps, twenty, thirty, or fifty printed pages of matter for us to consider, and moves a suspension of the rules to pass it, and we have to vote one way or the other. This comes from a gentleman in the minority, and we of the majority are willing to give them an opportunity to be heard; but the individual who holds the floor says there shall be no word of debate; silence is commanded; the majority have no right to extend to the minority the courtesy of being heard on the question. But under the rule now proposed the minority can say to the good sense of the majority, "Will you give us a chance to debate this question?" Under the old rule the individual who offers a proposition says that there shall be no debate upon it, when the majority of the House would, perhaps, allow debate. We cut off the right to filibuster, and if the rule cannot be adopted now I would be in favor of restoring the right which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] so strenuously insists upon.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to remind him that a case in which a suspension of the rules is moved is not one of the cases in which the minority ever filibuster? for the gentleman, and every other gentleman here, knows very well that a motion to suspend the rules is not a debatable motion.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I know it is not a debatable motion; but any gentleman can move to adjourn, and that is a privileged motion, and then some gentleman can move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Thursday or Friday next, and so on in endless succession, and no vote can be obtained.

Sir, the republican party have cut off that privilege which the minority had, and this rule proposes to extend to the minority some additional privileges to be heard. But, as I have already said, if the minority of the House do not want the privilege of debate, why I think, being in a parliamentary majority of two-thirds, I can stand it as long as any man.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order cannot interrupt a debate on a motion to amend the rules.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not think, sir, I shall need three minutes for a statement which I think will remove the constitutional objection. This is simply a question of the order of business and nothing else. Under the rules of this House a member may at any time get up in his place and offer a resolution and have it submitted to the House for its vote, unless some other business is going on under the rules of the House; but there always is some other business going on. Now, a motion to suspend the rules is simply a motion to lay aside the question that the House is engaged upon and proceed to another question; and under the rules, as at present constituted, one-fifth of the House may at any time say that four-fifths of the House shall lay aside the business on which they are engaged and pass to another question, and without debate or amendment record their votes on that question. Practically, one-fifth of the House can deprive four-fifths of the right of proceeding with the business in which they are engaged, and compel them to pass from what they are doing and record their votes on some other question.

Now, sir, it is no invasion of the constitutional right to say that four-fifths of the House shall at the demand of one-fifth be compelled to leave the question on which they are engaged and proceed to the consideration of another. During the last ten days of the session one-fifth of the House can prevent the majority of the House from going on with its business, and compel us to record our names upon measures not of practical legislation, which they could not expect to be passed, instead of voting upon questions of practical legislation, and therefore the question is this: does the House value the right of one-fifth of its members—a constitutional right if you call it so—to demand a record on the yeas and nays on purely speculative questions more than it values the right of four-fifths of the House to deal with its practical business, more than it values the right of debate, because all these questions are undebatable? That is the whole of it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will my colleague [Mr. G. F. HOAR] allow me to give him an illustration? In the Forty-first Congress a bill for the reconstruction of certain Southern States was being read by the Clerk in the last ten days, having been perfected by a committee of this House, and thereupon a gentleman on the opposite side got up and moved to suspend the rules. Under the ruling of the Speaker, and a ruling rightly made no doubt, the reading of that bill was stopped then and there, and the measure failed, because it never could be brought before the House again during that session.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. And was not that a violation of the Constitution in its spirit, essence, and purpose? Is it not a violation of the right of the American people to self-government to tolerate a rule of this House by which, when four-fifths of the House direct a bill to be read for the purpose of legislation, any one can get up and say, "In spite of your wishes this measure shall be laid aside, and you shall devote yourselves to recording your opinions on another question," perhaps an abstract question, which they do not expect to ripen into a measure of legislation? Under the new rule proposed, a majority seconding the proposition, a vote by yeas and nays can be obtained.

I submit, therefore, that when gentlemen talk about the constitutional right to have the vote by yeas and nays recorded, they are "sticking in the bark." It is not a question whether the House, when it comes to a vote, shall record that vote by yeas and nays on the Journal; it is a question whether the House shall choose which measure it shall deal with first. That is all.

Mr. MELLISH. Is it not in the interest of good legislation to have the yeas and nays taken as often as possible?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. No, sir.

Mr. MELLISH. And, therefore, should not every facility be given for that purpose? I think the yeas and nays should be taken at least on every question involving an expenditure.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It is not in the interest of good legislation to have the yeas and nays taken without debate or without opportunity of amendment. It is in the interest of good legislation to have the yeas and nays taken in a deliberative body on matters of practical legislation. If the gentleman had been here a little longer he would have understood that this proposed rule does not diminish the right to have the yeas and nays taken on any matter that is expected to go through, but it facilitates that.

Mr. DAWES. How does the gentleman know that this will not interfere with matters of practical legislation that are expected to go through?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I know it in this way——

Mr. DAWES. The mischief of the rule is, that while it covers things that all of us see are not practicable, it also covers everything else.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I know; but if it is intended to accomplish the proposed measure, does not my colleague [Mr. DAWES] see that if the majority sustains the motion, the yeas and nays can then be recorded?

Mr. DAWES. Then it is only such questions as the majority of the House may see proper to have brought before it that the yeas and nays can be called upon.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The only foundation of my colleague's zealous argument is this, that he thinks that sometimes, under the yeas and nays, members of Congress may be dragooned by their fear of public opinion, or their fear of misrepresentation, to vote against their conscience and their wishes; that is the difficulty.

Mr. DAWES. No; that is just what this rule is desired for—to prevent members of Congress from being "dragooned" to record their names.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If my friend gives me of his time he should not insist upon using it himself.

Mr. DAWES. I want you to answer my question.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let us see which of us is right; that is a very important practical question. Under the rule now proposed by the Committee on Rules, whenever a majority of the House shall consent to entertain the question whether the rules shall be suspended and the business be laid aside that the House is then considering, and shall proceed to record its vote on a newly proposed measure, then it shall do it. Therefore, if in their consciences the majority think that the thing proposed should be done, then they will vote in its favor and no harm will be done. It is only when upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules the majority will vote one way, and on the yeas and nays they would vote the other, that the existing rule secures any practical result to anybody. Therefore, unless my colleague is prepared to charge that usually and as a rule the members of this House will vote against their consciences and their wishes in the matter of simply recording their votes, he is proposing to keep in force a policy which dragoons men into voting against their consciences and their wishes.

Mr. DEWITT. Why is it that under the present rule the power of the Speaker to entertain a motion to suspend the rules was taken away except during the last ten days of the session, and on Monday of every week, at the expiration of the morning hour?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is to prevent abuse.

Mr. DEWITT. Why confine the power of the Speaker to entertain those motions to those days?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Because it was supposed that there might be times during the session when the exigencies of the country might require a departure from the ordinary rules of business; and that is now secured.

Mr. DAWES. Before yielding to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] as I have promised, I want to turn my colleague on my left [Mr. G. F. HOAR] over to my colleague on my right, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Would you really be guilty of that?

Mr. DAWES. I would not, but for extraordinary reasons. The one says this rule is intended to do the very thing which the other says it will prevent being done. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not like this rule, because it clearly takes away a right of the minority by them believed to be valuable; nor do I see any corresponding merit in it in the way of convenience upon Monday, in saving the House a vote or votes upon impracticable questions.

Upon Monday, as in the last ten days of the session, it is the right of any member to move to suspend the rules, and upon that the yeas and nays may be directly called. And, Mr. Speaker, the motion to suspend the rules may be of no value to the member making it or the gentlemen in favor of the motion, without the right to call the yeas and nays.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] asks whether this proposed rule is any more in the direction of cutting off the right of the minority than the existing rule as to seconding the previous question, which requires a majority on a vote that cannot be taken by yeas and nays. Undoubtedly it is in that direction; and the illustration furnished by his question is a pertinent one. Have gentlemen examined into the history of this very subject of seconding the previous question? The action taken from time to time on this subject has been in the direction we are now going—an abridgment of the right of the minority, to which I object. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the seconding of the demand for the previous question might, as the term "seconding" implies, be accomplished by two persons, one moving it and another seconding it. In the jealous care then manifested for the minority, it was the right of two persons; it did not require a majority to bring the matter before the House. So the rule continued until 1811, when it was provided that the previous question must be seconded by one-fifth of the House, it being put in this respect upon the same footing as the calling for the yeas and nays. That was another move in the direction of cutting off the right of the minority to bring a matter before the House. In the next year there was a still further change, and the seconding of the previous question was put, as it is now, under the control of a majority of the House, and no less. Upon any question a majority, by an unrecorded vote, may stifle any proposition, may put it in the tomb, may prevent a yea and nay vote; and this, as members know, frequently operates perniciously. By gradual steps the minority—I do not mean a political minority simply, but the minority on any matter—have been put in such a position that the majority, by an unrecorded vote, may prevent a public expression. This they must submit to; it has become crystallized as a rule of the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have but little time; and I do not want to have the thread of my argument broken.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would not yield either, if I were making such an argument.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Now, there being left to the minority the right upon Mondays on a motion to suspend the rules, to require by one-fifth of those present, a recorded vote, it is proposed to go still further and take away that which is left, by applying to the motion to suspend the rules the principle now applied to seconding the previous question. The movement being in that direction, and I believing that the proceeding in that direction has gone far enough, I am not in favor of the proposition.

Is there any call for the adoption of such a rule? Is there any need that this side of the House should enforce this proposition? Are we afraid of being put upon the record on any particular subject-matter that gentlemen on the other side of the House may see fit to bring before us? I have sometimes been annoyed and provoked at propositions put in here on Mondays, upon which I was very reluctant to vote. But I have found that those propositions, if fairly and squarely met, if gentlemen come up and vote upon them as they believe to be consistent with their duty, never give us any trouble afterward. So much for the personal view of the question.

Now take the political aspect of this matter. Does this side of the House object to propositions that the other side may see fit to present and ask us to vote upon, that the record may go to the country? If we stand firm; if our course be one of propriety; if the administration is well conducted; if it is looking in the right direction, and if the people see and believe this, they will sustain us. We need not be afraid of any political propositions coming in here that will embarrass us. I for one have no fear of that whatever.

So that personally as it applies to the convenience of members, and politically as affecting us in a party sense, there is no real benefit to be derived from the adoption of this proposition commensurate in my mind with the disadvantage of going another step in a direction, perhaps too far taken already, of curtailing the rights of the minority.

I have said once before on this floor that, so far as the minority of this House is concerned, I believe that in years past it has behaved generally with great prudence and discretion. In the two terms of Congress during which I have had the honor to serve here there have been very few occasions when the opposition, always able to "filibuster," as it is called, have resorted to that proceeding. The case of the civil-rights bill was one; because that measure came in without discussion, and was proposed to be put through on a call of the States upon the previous question. But generally, on party matters, considering that the minority has been at the mercy of this side of the House, I am free to say that the conduct of those gentlemen within the four years which my service here embraces has been fair and prudent on most occasions.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this amendment to the rules to be adopted without protesting against it. I look upon it as unnecessary and a gratuitous wrong on our part to limit the rights of the minority here. To-day I am with the majority on this floor; next week I may not be. I have been in bodies where I acted with minorities; and remembering the benefits that I have received from rules securing the rights of minorities I resolved then, as solemnly as my eloquent friend from Massachusetts resolved upon the battle-field over the bodies of the slain colored troops to defend their rights, that I would never do anything, as a member of a legislative body, tending to restrict or deprive the minority of any right I had enjoyed as a member of such body.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the time is unfortunate for gentlemen to attempt this innovation. As one of the new members of this House—the only one thus far heard on the question; perhaps the only one who will be—I look with extreme jealousy upon any amendment of the rules which tends in any way either to limit the rights of the minority or to concentrate in the hands of a few the management of affairs on this floor. This proposed change of the rule does both of these things, if I understand it; and for one I protest against it, and shall vote against its adoption.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the evils to which reference has been made will flow if we continue the rule as it has been during the last fifty-odd years. It has been the outgrowth of parliamentary experience long continued, and we must not forget that the very privilege which is accorded under the rule, as it now stands, is limited to a certain day, because it is provided that motions to suspend the rule shall only be in order on Monday. I say, let those men who are in the minority—let me, if I happen to be in the minority, and I may be on some questions very soon—have that opportunity for the expression of their opinions which time has shown to be a privilege properly extended to the minority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another proposition. I chafe somewhat under it, I confess. The rules of this House are new to me, but I have been trying to understand them; I have studied them diligently, and will continue to study them diligently while I remain a member upon this floor. I confess, I say, that I chafe somewhat under the fact that when getting up, representing as I do a considerable constituency, I have to beg some gentleman for the privilege of saying a word on this floor, either for the purpose of expressing my own ideas or advocating the rights of the people whom I represent.

Mr. SCOFIELD rose.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not wish to be interrupted. I say that I sometimes chafe under it, that gentlemen on this floor who have had large experience, whose fame is known all over the land, who are astute managers of parliamentary bodies, get the floor whenever they desire it, and we have to ask them for the privilege of being heard; and now I see an attempt to concentrate more power in their hands, and to limit still further the privileges of the minority; I am against it first, last, and all the time. I am willing to stand by the old rules which have been so successful during the past.

Now let us see what has been the history of this rule. It is a bad time otherwise to cut off this privilege. When this session began one would have thought the millennium had come. I saw amnesty bills passed without a dissenting vote. I have met men on this floor who only a few years ago I would not have dared meet unless armed cap-a-pie. I have seen men coming to take their seats here whom I have always looked upon heretofore as the enemies of mankind, but who, on coming in contact with them, I have found are not bad men at all. I feel kindly disposed toward them; but I do not wish when I have voted for amnesty to them—I do not wish, I say, to cut off from them any of the rights which they now have. I will not do it certainly by voting for this amendment to the rule. That is what it does do. It puts me in the position, as it may in the next twenty-four hours, of cutting my own throat on this question. While I belong to-day to the great majority in power, I may before the end of the session, on some other question, desire to get exactly what the minority desire when they wish to get an expression of opinion—I may desire to get an expression on some question on which the great republican party is not united.

There is another proposition. I know how gentlemen learnedly argue constitutional questions, but I come from a place where constitutional questions are argued, perhaps not with the acuteness or technical learning with which they have been argued for the last fifty or seventy-five years upon this floor. But I take the ordinary acceptation of the terms, and understand them as common men would naturally. I will read this section of the Constitution:

> Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on the question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

I understand completely the acumen with which the gentleman from Massachusetts gets around that language. He says this is not an infraction of the Constitution, that it is not a question until it is entertained by the House, but a motion. A motion and a question used in parliamentary discussion are interchangeable. Sometimes a proposition is called a question and sometimes a motion. In the Constitution it is called a question. In this rule it is called a motion, and therefore evades the provision of the Constitution. I do not believe that it is a fair, liberal, and honest construction of that part of the Constitution which provides that all questions shall upon a demand of one-fifth of the members be disposed of by a yea and nay vote. Believing that, if I felt the necessity for that rule, which I do not, I could not, under, the view which I take of the Constitution, consistently vote for this amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not propose to prolong the debate, for I expect to add very little to the arguments on one side or the other, except simply to say this: When the question was before the House formerly, as the minority seemed disturbed by the proposed rule, and apprehended an infraction of their rights, I believe I moved to recommit it; at all events I was in favor of recommitting it to the committee. I now find that the committee have reported it back, after careful consideration.

It now comes back as a report from the same committee; and if I believed that the adoption of this would infract in one iota the rights of the minority or of any member of this House I should not vote for it. I do not think that the gentlemen who compose the minority think so themselves, many of them. But the rule as amended, or an amendment of the rule, is more necessary to guard us against the action of the majority upon this floor than to prevent any injury which the minority may suffer. I find there is more trouble with the majority than with the minority on this floor in regard to the propositions that emanate here. Some member on our side will get up, having some financial maggot in his head, some idea which he thinks if carried out by a resolution adopted by the House will heal all the evils which the country suffers on financial questions, and he will get together nine or ten good propositions and one or two bad ones, and insist on having us put on the record. And we have these buncombe resolutions every Monday. As sure as the week begins we have to record our votes on them on one side or the other; although in reference to such a resolution one might be glad to vote for three-fourths of it while for the remaining fourth he cannot vote.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] has suggested that the country always understands it. The country does understand it is a perfect humbug in the way of legislation to present these buncombe resolutions and pass upon them by the vote of the House one day after another. A week ago last Monday three resolutions were offered in succession by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and by my colleague at my side, [Mr. HAWLEY,] diametrically opposed to each other; and still this House gave majorities for every one of them. It was a regular triangular Midshipman Easy's sort of a duel of resolutions, which one fired into the other and into the wrong man, and the whole thing was a simple disgrace to the good judgment of the House, having no effect whatever, so far as practical legislation is concerned, in the eyes of the country. Now, I look at the rule as it stands as being on Mondays and during the last ten days of the session an obstruction to judicious and honest legislation, and it has defeated important bills at the close of the session. One instance I remember now. In the case of the civil-rights bill, at the very close of the session, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was taken off the floor by a motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to suspend the rules and repeal the duty on coal. That proposition was so popular that it went through the House. We repealed the duty on coal, and if it could have gone through the Senate it would have been well enough. The Committee on Finance in the Senate took it up, brought in a complete new bill revising the whole tariff, in violation of the right of the House to initiate such a measure, and sent it to the House at the next session, very much to the disgust, I remember, of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. That is an illustration of the kind of legislation we get during the last ten days of the session. Now, as I said at the outset of my remarks, if I could see any way in which the rights of the minority can be infringed by this rule, I should certainly oppose it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman tell us how legislation is obstructed by the rule as it now stands? If it does obstruct legislation, as the gentleman says, to abolish that rule would give larger rights to the minority.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. And at the same time I desire to put another question to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would prefer answering one question at a time. In reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I would say that a measure of importance may be pending during the last hours of the session, when a member may get up and move to suspend the rules. If one-fifth stands by him you go through the yeas and nays, which take three-quarters of an hour, instead of proceeding with the consideration of the other measure.

Mr. DAWES. I would like the gentleman to show how this protects the minority against the passage of such popular measures as he stated a little while ago always carried the majority along with them?

Mr. KELLOGG. In the case I refer to we took the yeas and nays, and at the same time took the gentleman from Massachusetts off the floor.

Mr. DAWES. It is the recording of the yeas and nays that troubles my friend from Connecticut. I see that is the trouble with my friend.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am willing to vote on any measure of practical legislation on a yea and nay vote, and face the music every time; but I do not care to vote on your buncombe resolutions, half good and half bad, which amount to nothing in the way of legislation. But when any gentleman gets up a resolution on financial questions with four or five good things in it and one bad, I do not want to be required to vote upon it. I object to such resolutions being pressed upon us without the opportunity of debate or explanation.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to move an amendment to the proposed rule, so as to provide that upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules the yeas and nays may be called.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let us allow the yeas and nays to be called on the motion to second the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. POTTER. That is the same thing over again.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That will settle the question whether one man shall have the right to require the House to vote on a particular proposition.

Mr. DAWES. That meets my views, but I hardly think it will meet the views of my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; it does.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield now, for a few moments, to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I have scarcely known a debate on any subject to run off on side issues, and so entirely miss the point involved on the subject under consideration, as this debate has done. By some strange misunderstanding this has been talked of as a rule to interfere with the rights of the minority. Now I deny that in toto. This rule relates no more to the political minority of the House than it does to the Senate. The plain purport of this rule is, that it shall not be the right of one member, or one-fifth, not of the political minority only, but of the majority, to push aside the business of this House, and by the help of one-fifth compel every other man in this House to vote on any subject he pleases without a word of debate and without a chance of amendment. Any one man, with one-fifth of the House at his back, can put the House through its paces on any question on earth that he pleases. This rule only provides that before any one member shall be empowered to do this he shall show that a majority of the members are willing that the question shall be brought before them and disposed of without amendment or debate in the precise words he pleases to use.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] strangely enough, has argued that this is an infringement of the rights of the minority. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] made an eloquent speech on the rights of the minority, and I agree with him, except where he says that this rule interferes with it. I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] cures every evil that can be conjured up against the rule, and that is, that on a motion made on Monday to suspend the rules the yeas and nays may be called upon this proposition, which is equivalent to the previous question.

The Committee on the Rules have brought in this measure in answer to a general request for the adoption of such a rule. At least twenty members of the House have come to members of the Committee on the Rules and asked them to urge the passage of this rule, members from both sides of the House, and who have said that they misapprehended the rule when first presented and are now convinced that it ought to be adopted. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, who are sitting silent to-day, have done this.

Many MEMBERS on the democratic side of the House. Who are they?

Mr. GARFIELD. You do not care to have their names.

Several MEMBERS. Yes, we do.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has been the same on our side of the House, and we have brought back the rule in its original signification. Under the rule now existing, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] may be called up to vote that peace ought to be established and polygamy put down, and that, therefore, the Springfield arsenal ought to be razed to the ground and polygamy abolished. It is that sort of thing that the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to allow one-fifth of the House to require us to vote upon, and he opposes this rule in the name of the rights of the minority; and yet that same gentleman from Massachusetts was the leader in support of the proposition to cut off filibustering by the minority, and to say that under certain circumstances gentlemen on the other side of the House should have the right to make but one dilatory motion. He led a movement that was a very marked abridgment of the right of filibustering by the minority. Here is a question in which he is fighting for the rights of one-fifth against the whole, and against the right of debate. It is precisely the lack of this rule which has given the House of Representatives the character of a house of demagogues; of a body of men who vote merely for show, but without any regard to merit. The difference between the Senate and the House in the character they sustain before the country consists mainly in the fact that our wash-day, Monday, or, as it has been more profanely called, our "devil's day," gives the House of Representatives all over the country the character of being a collection of humbug politicians; a character which we by no means would have were it not for the lack of just this rule, and the occurrence of such scenes as we have here on Mondays.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman join with me in getting rid of suspensions of the rules on Mondays?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, except for this——

Mr. POTTER. Except for some such things as the majority are willing to have.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; we need sometimes a suspension of the rules in order to fix a day for considering some measure. For instance, sometimes when the House believes that one thing on its Calendar very low down ought to be considered sooner than some other thing higher up, a suspension of the rules is important for the purpose of saying that that particular thing shall be heard and considered on a particular day.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and all the gentlemen supporting this rule base it upon the ground that it is right that the majority should at any time say what shall be the order of business. That principle would do away with all rules, with every rule of this House; and the majority might say any minute that they would take up just what they chose. There is no use of any rules at all, except they provide that the majority of the House shall be restrained in doing what they have to do.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Allow me a question.

Mr. DAWES. No; wait one moment. One word more to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The strangest statement I ever heard in my life he made here: that I stood up here with one hundred and thirty-four others to prevent him and ninety-six others from recording their votes upon this measure—from recording their votes at all upon this measure. Does he not know what he wanted was to have the votes recorded before the one hundred and thirty-five members had expressed their opinion? What he wanted was to prevent the one hundred and thirty-five members from expressing their opinion before they were required to record their votes. Does he not know that the Constitution has guaranteed to one-fifth of the members of this House the right to have their names recorded on this measure, and that a majority could not by any device, or any plan, or any scheme, in the name of a rule, take away that right?

Now, sir, if my friend from Ohio is content to have the question of a second by the majority on a motion to suspend the rules decided by the yeas and nays, what is he complaining of under the standing rule as it is? That leaves the question exactly where it was before. I am content with such an amendment to the proposed rule, because it brings the question right back to the old one. The old rule is just as good as this rule with that amendment, and this rule with the amendment is just as good as the old rule. It only provides for one additional vote, for taking so much more time. Yet my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] who was in favor of this rule, now proposes, after discussion, when he finds that the very essence of all rules will be trampled upon by giving the right to the majority at any time to say what shall be done—he is now willing to say that you may have the yeas and nays on the seconding of the motion to suspend the rules. That, I say, takes away all my argument, for it leaves the case exactly as it was before.

I do not desire to take the management of this subject from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] to whom it belongs. Therefore I now yield the floor to him, to make just such motion in reference to his rule as he may choose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was of opinion that the House would be prepared, with the additional hour that is given under the rules, and which I promised to divide among gentlemen if it was accorded to me by seconding my call for the previous question—I say I was of the opinion that the House would have been satisfied with that much debate on this question, and therefore I submitted a motion for the previous question. The result of the vote on that motion demonstrated that the House were not prepared to close the debate in that time.

A great deal has been said about the rights of minorities, about checking minorities, and embarrassing minorities. Sir, when I first came to this House and for four years thereafter, I stood here in a minority of less than fifty. I have been in the minority; I think I appreciate, I feel I understand, what are the rights of a minority. And, sir, if I know myself I am incapable by any vote, by any act of mine, of doing anything that would in the slightest degree trench upon those rights.

I have also been in a majority of more than two-thirds. I know where any abuses, any embarrassments, any serious inconveniences arising from these motions to suspend the rules are to be found. Rarely has an instance occurred—I cannot now think of one—in which I have been embarrassed by such a motion coming from an opposition minority. The embarrassments have been from some gentleman of the majority, some headlong, ambitious spirit, who would thrust in a question, by means of a motion to suspend the rules, that I at least had not sufficiently considered, had not bestowed sufficient thought upon to justify me in taking the responsibility of acting the one way or the other. It always is upon these motions to suspend the rules that we are questioned categorically and required upon a proposition that is so submitted to say "ay" or "no," when to say either "ay" or "no" will subject a member to be misunderstood, to be misconstrued, or will put him in a false position by being obliged to answer either the one way or the other, without opportunity to make explanation or qualification.

Is is argued that this rule will interfere with the right under the Constitution to have the yeas and nays upon any question before the House when demanded by one-fifth of those present. The fallacy in that argument lies in confounding a motion for a question with a question itself. When I move, as I did awhile ago, the previous question, I cannot have it unless my motion is sustained by a majority. Neither one-fifth nor two-fifths nor any number of fifths can get the yeas and nays upon the question unless that motion is seconded by a majority. Under this proposed rule, when I move to suspend the rules, unless my motion is seconded by a majority of those present, the question will not be put. If the question is put then one-fifth have a right to demand the yeas and nays. The fallacy, as it expresses itself to my mind, is in losing sight of the distinction between a question and the motion for a question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am aware that when we get to discussing the Constitution, the general rights and interests of mankind, we are very apt to soar beyond the small questions before us, like the counsel of the Roman suitor, who, dilating upon the perfidy of Hannibal at the battle of Cannæ, lost sight of the two little kids that were the subject of controversy. Now, the rule which we propose is that, whenever any gentleman shall move to suspend the rules for any purpose, his motion, unless it is seconded by a majority vote, shall not be put.

Something is said about interfering with the action of the House. Now I submit this question to gentlemen: when a motion is put in good faith, and it is found that it cannot command a majority vote, is it reasonable to suppose that it can command a two-thirds vote? Whenever any question of legislation is submitted; whenever a bill is proposed; whenever any proposition is reduced to the form of a statutory enactment, it is every man's duty to say "ay" or "no" upon the question. But it does not require a great deal of ingenuity to invent a dilemma that will impale every one of us in one form or another. My friend from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] offered yesterday a financial resolution—a resolution of instruction—to the committee of which I am a member. There were some things in that resolution which I heartily indorsed and approved; there were others that did not meet my approval. I voted against it.

Mr. DEWITT. This rule would not have prevented a vote on those financial resolutions the other day, because a majority was in favor of them.

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly not. My friend, like other gentlemen, falls into the error of supposing that somehow this is a question between the republican majority and the democratic minority. Nothing could be farther from the fact. We are continually dividing upon questions that have no politics in them; and questions of this character are far more numerous than merely political questions. When a political question comes up it causes us no trouble; my friend from New York [Mr. DEWITT] votes with the democrats, and I vote with the republicans. That is all easy work; that is plain sailing. Political necessity, higher than that "necessity which knows no law," does know a law, which is imperative; which makes no exceptions; which never pretermits and never slumbers. But, sir, it is upon the many questions having no political consequence, questions of finance——

Mr. DEWITT. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me, I will explain the remark I made just now. The other day resolutions were passed inconsistent with each other, it is said, on the subject of finance. Now, under the operation of this amendment to the rules, those resolutions could still have been put to a vote of the House, and we could still have been brought to a record on them without any explanation of our position, because, as appeared by the record, a majority was in favor of those resolutions. But if a member of the minority chose to get up with a resolution providing for a resumption of specie payments, a majority of the House, being opposed to it, could refuse us the right to put our names upon the record in favor of the proposition and the names of other gentlemen on the record against it. That will be the operation of this rule. It infringes upon the right of the minority to have both the opponents and the friends of a measure go upon the record. But it does not touch the right of the majority to force the minority to go upon the record on any question upon which the majority choose to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. POTTER. The majority for the time being.

Mr. MAYNARD. Though on a question submitted under a suspension of the rules I am compelled to vote "ay" or "no," and though even a majority may be compelled to vote "ay" as a choice between an affirmative and a negative vote, one of which must necessarily be given, it does not follow that the majority might not prefer not to be catechised in that manner; and this rule will allow the question to be submitted to us whether we desire to vote on any proposition presented on a motion to suspend the rules. I suggest to the gentleman that very probably, if we had had such a rule as is now proposed when those resolutions to which he refers were presented the other day, neither of them would have been adopted or voted upon, for the reason that a large majority of the House would have said, "We are not prepared to-day to answer this question categorically." The instance that I put illustrates precisely what I mean as to the operation of this rule.

Mr. MELLISH. The provision of the Constitution is that—

The yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

Now I wish to inquire whether that provision is not absolute and unconditional, and whether this proposed rule will not make the exercise of the constitutional right conditional on the prior passage of another motion?

Mr. MAYNARD. I had endeavored to explain my views on that point, but I fear I was not successful in my explanation, or the gentleman who sits so near me and was attending to me so well would not have asked the question. I will restate it. One-fifth of the House have a right to have the yeas and nays recorded on any question, but a motion for a question is not a question. One-fifth have a right to demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, and no man can bring the House to a vote on ordering the main question unless his demand for the previous question is sustained by a majority of those present.

Mr. MELLISH. Is not "any question" comprehensive enough to cover anything which can be put to this House by the Speaker?

Mr. MAYNARD. It would allow any gentleman to present any question when he could get the Speaker's eye and submit it, and demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MELLISH. I take it it means all questions.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have attempted to explain that a question and a motion whether a question shall be presented are two different and distinct things, as wide apart as possible. I instanced it by a very familiar instance, and I will call the gentleman's attention to it, and ask him to consider it. The motion for the previous question is not a question; it is a motion simply; and a motion pertains only when it has the sanction of a majority of those present. The yeas and nays can be demanded only after the majority have seconded the previous question, and not until then.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] intimates to me that he would like a moment of my time, I believe I shall have to exact from him a pledge that his distinguished colleague [Mr. DAWES] shall not make it the cause for renewing the perennial contest we have witnessed so often in this House on so many different occasions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to obtrude myself on the House further on this question, but there are two or three suggestions I wish to make. And one of them is this: The rule which allows us to move a suspension of the rules only obtains on Monday. How is it that it is constitutional to limit that great right to Monday, while for the five remaining days of the week, upon the argument made against one rule, we go on unconstitutionally, because nobody can make a motion to suspend the rules at all by a two-thirds vote except on Monday? Therefore this is only a constitutional House on Monday. The rule preventing any motion for a suspension applies to-day, and if my friend before me should get up and say to the Speaker, "Mr. Speaker, I submit the question whether the moon is made of green cheese," [laughter,] the Speaker would reply, "You cannot submit that now under the rules." Then he must reply, "I must have a vote on it, because one-fifth of the members of the House want to find out how the House stand, and record their votes on that question, and it is unconstitutional to prevent me doing it." The evidence that this is a just view of the right of the House to frame rules, when applied to the order of business, is the fact that our fathers at the very time they made the Constitution—indeed, in the very Convention where the Constitution was made—had rules limiting the manner and order of their business. This shows their construction of the very constitutional provision as to the right to have the yeas and nays recorded which they made. The difference is this: when any question is put for the action of the House, in legislation or otherwise, the members have the right to record their votes on the demand of one-fifth of those present; but when the motion comes up, will we have this subject up to-day or shall we take the other up to-morrow, then they have no right to invoke this constitutional provision in their behalf, because it is on the order of business.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, I shall not violate the pledge on which I obtained the floor, not to raise a controversy with my colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] if I call attention to one remarkable argument, of course never made in this House, but which I must have heard in some other body, somewhere else, at some other time. That argument was, that because the people have sent two-thirds of the Representatives of this House of the republican persuasion, or at least thought so when they sent some of them here, [laughter,] therefore they having intrusted to these their Representatives the power to order the business of legislation, we should not use it, because it has been given us. What, then, was the use of giving us that power? They ought to have sent a majority of the other side, who, if I know them as they used to be, would have exercised the power which the people give into their hands to have and order the business of the House as they thought best for the country. Why should we have two-thirds majority here, if the fact that we have two-thirds majority ought to prevent us from exercising our own judgment as to what shall be brought before the House for the benefit of the country in the way of legislation?

In days so far back that my memory hardly recalls them I must have heard that argument—it could not have been here and now; but I could never see how it would stand a moment's examination. I pray the House, I pray the republican majority—a two-thirds majority, whom the people have intrusted with doing the business of the country—exercise your own judgment in the line of the wishes of those who chose you to wield that power, and do not surrender it and lay it down at the feet of your opponents; because the people have given you that great power to use in wisdom.

Sir, I saw the republican majority of this House paralyzed by our present rule. As chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction, for a whole session I labored to perfect the reconstruction act and the Ku-Klux act. To do so I summoned here from the South witnesses at a cost of thousands of dollars. I perfected a bill. It was being read by the Clerk from that desk to be put on its passage, I having the right to report at any time. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] rose in his place, and, while the Clerk was reading, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill repealing the duty on coal, leaving our republican friends in the South to be murdered by hundreds, while we were thus drawn away from our purpose; and the Speaker ruled that the rule under which the Clerk was reading the bill was a rule of the House, and a vote to suspend it must be taken, and therefore the republican majority of the House had to stop and go into the question of coal, and leave human life unguarded by necessary legislation. The failure of that bill caused us to spend a session of the Forty-second Congress in March immediately following, and we were six weeks bringing up legislation to the point where it had been at the moment the bill was being read, when the democratic minority, in virtue of the rule of the House, took the business of the House out of the hands of the republican majority.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to assure my friend and colleague that I have kept as far from him as possible.

Mr. DAWES. I know it; and my colleague shows his discretion in doing so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree to that. There are certain things I do keep away from with great energy and vigilance. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. What I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, was this: My colleague has never been in this House in a minority. He has had his measures obstructed by a minority. I have been in this House in a minority as well as in a majority; and under these same rules I have co-operated in preventing what the country has since decided to have been the very worst possible measures. I have been here all night fighting to prevent the Lecompton constitution from becoming a law.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. And did that do any good?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly it did. And I have fought in like manner, under the rules, the fugitive-slave laws, and measures of that class. I have had experience in the minority. I have insisted that the very purpose of the rule was not to facilitate the action of the majority, but to protect minorities. It was considered wise on the whole that while these rules do, as my colleague says, sometimes interrupt or prevent for a time—not permanently—what is good legislation, it has been, on the whole and in the long run, a good thing and a wise thing that we shall have rules that would take care of a minority.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. He says that rules are made to take care of minorities. I would like to know why he is in favor of suspending them. If the rules are made to take care of minorities the suspension of the rules must be made to overrun minorities.

Mr. DAWES. The very rule itself provides for its own suspension. That is my answer.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to correct an unconscious mistake as to fact on the part of my colleague. He says that I never have been here in a minority. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have been pretty nearly always in a minority. I have endeavored here to carry out my own ideas in legislation as well as I could, and, unfortunately, I have found myself often in a minority of my political friends under the lead of my honorable colleague. Sir, I have felt the pressure of leadership in this House. More, perhaps, than any other man, I have felt the pressure of the gentleman, who, by official position, has got the ear of the House, who not only has the House under his lead, but holds it by the ear longer and more pertinaciously than anybody else ever did. I have felt the necessity of rules beyond all peradventure to protect me in the House from the tyranny of a majority under his lead. I desire to do nothing which will take away protection from minorities. I am not talking about party minorities. I differ frequently from my party—sometimes even on party questions, but on them rarely—but on other questions I have most usually been in a minority. I have been in a minority on finance questions. On these I have struggled here for four years, and I trust I am now nearer a majority on them from the public intelligence being now with me. Having been in a minority so frequently, I am earnest that the rights of minorities shall be protected. At the same time, while I want that, I do not think it is the right of a single man to rise up here and hinder all legislation, as they may do; nor do I think it is well that my colleague, or anybody else, should be forced every Monday to move an adjournment at an earlier hour than we adjourn on any other day, in order to get rid of this very suspension of the rules business.

My friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] I believe, made a motion to adjourn yesterday; and it was argued with me by friends on the other side, when I desired that the House should not adjourn but should go to business on the Speaker's table, that it would be impossible to dispose of matters on the Speaker's table for one minute, because the moment we got at that some one would get up and make a motion to suspend the rules to get a vote on some theoretical question; and that, therefore, it was best to adjourn and go home, to prevent mischief. And the House yielded to the argument and adjourned. And, therefore, we lost half a day, and my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] will be lecturing the House in a few days for wasting time and not passing appropriation bills in the interest of economy.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If I could have got up an appropriation bill yesterday I should have been content.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; but the moment you tried yesterday to get up an appropriation bill, some member would start up and move to suspend the rules, and then down the gentleman would go, and his appropriation bill with him. [Laughter.] Sir, our present rules prevent us from dealing with the legislation of the country, which is pressing us, and this amended rule will prevent the majority from being kept voting on theoretical propositions and political traps, while the financial interests of the country are suffering, and the workingmen of this happy country of ours are starving for bread, and parading the streets of your cities out of employment. It is to prevent the consideration of theoretical questions to the exclusion of practical legislation that I stand here to ask that the two-thirds republican majority of this House, who are responsible for its proceedings, press forward the business of the country, and not be compelled to adjourn at three o'clock in the day in order to get rid of speculative matters. I believe that I have as firm convictions as most men, and I have a right to say, without undue self-laudation, that I do not hesitate to avow them whenever a proper call is made for their expression. But I do not think that any member has a right to ask me to deliver an opinion instantly on any question, however pressing, he may propose. I want time to think before I answer for the instruction of the country. Let me show you how this bringing the House to a vote on most questions may be used for the purposes of speculation and stock-jobbing. Some of my friends from the East, who are engaged in manufacturing operations, may send me resolutions, asking me to get a vote upon them, so as to see how the House stands on certain tariff questions in which they are interested, and so guide their business and sell their stocks in accordance with the opinion of the House. So some of my western friends, who want to know whether we are going to put a tax on whisky, may ask me to try that question, so that they may run their stills accordingly. So the capitalists may desire to get the temper of the House on resumption of specie payments, in order that they may decide whether it is best to create a panic. Others, more interested in Cuban affairs and in matters in reference to our foreign relations, send resolutions here for the purpose of committing the House, in order, if it be possible, to find out in advance what will be the action of Congress. It is to prevent that sort of thing that I desire this change in our rule.

One thing more. I asked my colleague [Mr. DAWES] if he did not yesterday vote to adjourn in order to get rid of tentative questions of this kind, and he answered me frankly that he did so do. Now, sir, I wish never to do indirectly what I can do directly. I want to be able to say directly by my vote I am not ready to vote on any question that may be proposed if it has not been considered or discussed, or that I would rather go on and do the business of the country than to spend time uselessly in making what is known as a "political record."

Sir, I think this a valuable amendment to the rule, and I trust that it will be adopted. It is said that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] eviscerates the rule. By no means. All that would happen under it would be that on the question whether a member shall bring forward for action, without amendment or discussion, any particular subject, the majority of the House may determine it by yeas and nays. But if a question comes up without such rule, members may have to record their votes, yea or nay, on propositions involved in a preamble with nine, ten, or twelve "whereases" in it; they must either vote against or vote for to the end of the chapter. And then, sir, when you go home you are told that you voted for this proposition and that proposition, when you are ready to take your Bible oath that you never voted for any of them, and some man pulls the resolution out of his pocket with all its "whereases" and shows you that you did. It is to prevent these tricks and catches of legislation that I favor this amendment to the rules.

At first, sir, I was disposed to vote against the amendment on the ground that it might interfere with the rights of the minority, but on reflection it commends itself to my judgment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the House that we vote now as under the previous question, and I will not avail myself of my right to an hour to close debate.

The SPEAKER. What amendments does the gentleman regard as pending?

Mr. MAYNARD. I am willing to admit the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I desire to move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WARD, of Illinois; and on a division there were—ayes 94, noes 79.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 115, nays 127, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Crutchfield, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Field, Fort, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Houghton, Kasson, Kendall, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lawson, Leach, Loughridge, Luttrell, Marshall, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Orr, Packard, Hosea W. So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the previous question upon the proposed amendment to the rules, and the amendments thereto.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Have I the power to withdraw my amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that power.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to object, the previous question not having been seconded.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Have I the right to renew the amendment?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will withdraw his call for the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think it is an unfair proceeding on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] to withdraw his amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is wholly within the power of the majority of the House. If they refuse to second the previous question the amendment can be renewed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think many members voted against laying the whole subject on the table with the understanding that the amendment was pending.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. ELDREDGE were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 108, noes 83.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. DAWES called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 125, nays 113, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Wilson, and Woodford—48.

So the main question was ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 795) making appropriations to pay salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Rules, upon which the main question had been ordered.

The amendment was to strike out the words "to go into Committee of the Whole," and insert in lieu thereof the words "where they may be suspended by a majority;" so that the proposed amendment would read:

All motions to suspend the rules, except where they may be suspended by a majority, shall, before being submitted to the House, be seconded by a majority, as in the case of the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose there is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon the rule as amended.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry for the information of some members. Is the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] to make the seconding a matter of yeas and nays, now before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not; it has been withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the whole subject be laid on the table.

The question being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 86, noes 103.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I appeal to the gentleman not to consume time by calling the yeas and nays. They have already been ordered upon the adoption of the rule, and we have consumed now a great deal of time on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 107, nays 122, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Field, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Jewett, Kasson, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lawson, Loughridge, Luttrell, Marshall, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, Orr, Packard, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Rawls, Read, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Smart, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standeford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Cotton, Crocker, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Farwell, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gunckel, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, George F. Hoar, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lawrence, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Orth, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, and James Wilson—122.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Atkins, Barnum, Barry, Berry, Buckner, Bundy, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clements, Creamer, Darrall, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Elliott, Fort, Freeman, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hooper, Howe, Hunter, Hunton, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Lansing, Leach, Magee, McJunkin, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Page, Phillips, Pike, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Tremain, Waddell, Walls, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Woodford—57.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. ARCHER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 62, noes 95.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. G. F. HOAR were appointed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the yeas and nays. It is evident we must take them eventually. The object of the other side is to filibuster.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire the ruling of the Chair on the question whether a dilatory motion is in order on a proposition to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold that a dilatory motion would not be in order; but he cannot rule that a motion to adjourn at a quarter after four o'clock, the usual hour, is a dilatory motion.

Mr. POTTER. If we adjourn, will not this business come before the House as the first thing to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will; and it must remain before the House until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business.

Several MEMBERS. Then there is no use in adjourning.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative, there being—yeas 70, nays 154, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buffinton, Caldwell, John B. Clark, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eldredge, Giddings, Glover, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Holman, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Rawls, Read, Robbins, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Southard, Standeford, Stone, Storm, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cotton, Crocker, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, George F. Hoar, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. Wilson, James Wilson, and Woodford—62.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 101, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cessna, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Cotton, Crocker, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gunckel, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Wilson, and Woodford—62.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. SENER stated that Mr. WHITELEY, of Georgia, was paired with Mr. LUTTRELL, of California, and that while the latter, if present, would vote in the negative, the former would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BROMBERG stated that he had paired with his colleague, Mr. HAYS, who, if present, would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined, and found truly enrolled, an act (S. No. 215) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book; when the Speaker signed the same.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House additional papers in the contested-election case of the first congressional district of Louisiana; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

EXPENSES OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in answer to a resolution of the House, of December 8, 1873, in relation to the expenses incurred in his Department upon the abolition of the franking privilege, and also inclosing a copy of the report to the Senate on the same subject; which, on motion of Mr. RANDALL, were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REBECCA A. MARTIN.

On motion of Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Rebecca A. Martin, there having been no adverse report on the case.

HOMESTEADS FOR ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1388) to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GROWTH OF TIMBER ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. TOWNSEND also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill [H. R. No. 1389] in reference to promoting the growth of timber on public lands in the West; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEVI W. POND.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1390) to amend an act entitled "An act confirming and extending a patent right to Levi W. Pond and the Eau Claire Lumber Company," approved June 10, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAWYER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1391) to repeal an act entitled "An act confirming and extending a patent right to Levi W. Pond and the Eau Claire Lumber Company," approved June 10, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider, and ordered to be printed.

PATENTS AND COPYRIGHTS.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1392) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights," approved July 8, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. MAYNARD, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 21, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Mrs. Maria W. Currier and 32 others, and the petition of Le Roy Sunderland and other citizens of Massachusetts, for the same national protection of women in the exercise of their right to vote that colored men now enjoy; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a petition of Mrs. Eliza B. Seymour and 26 others, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented the petition of Lieutenant Ebenezer S. Cheesebro, of Bristol, Rhode Island, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of Clara A. Austin and other citizens of Allegany County, New York, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have received a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, requesting the representatives of that State in Congress to vote for an appropriation to promote the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence. I ask, according to the usual practice, that the resolution be read and laid on the table.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has, by an act passed in 1871, provided for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of American independence in the city of Philadelphia, and the President of the United States has by proclamation invited the attention of all nations to this celebration; and whereas it is absolutely essential to the success of this proposed celebration that a considerable sum of money should be promptly raised: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of New Jersey, (the House of Assembly concurring,) That we request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Jersey to vote for such an appropriation as shall enable those having the matter in charge to discharge the duties devolved upon them in accordance with the requirements of the occasion.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of citizens of New Jersey, members of the Board of Trade of the city of Camden, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Senie G. Spencer and 22 others; the petition of Lydia Ann Pitkin and others, citizens of the United States; the petition of Mary A. Davis and others, of Michigan; the petition of May K. Herrman and others, citizens of the United States; and the petition of Deborah Reed and others, citizens of the United States, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Mrs. C. Price and others, of the State of Minnesota, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. STEWART presented the petition of John D. Clarke praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of Washington Crosland, praying payment for damages arising from the seizure and use of his property by the Government in the city of Saint Louis; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Jane Woodward and other citizens of Iowa, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MORTON presented the memorial of the Women's Suffrage Association of Indianapolis, remonstrating against the passage of the pending bill to limit suffrage in the Territories to males; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of Matilda Leipsker, widow of Joseph B. Leipsker, late of the city of New York, praying that the United States Government present a claim to the Peruvian Government for reparation for the assassination of Joseph B. Leipsker; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Indiana, praying a modification of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Mrs. Emily G. Robinson and 180 other citizens of Ohio, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Mrs. A. Alden and 624 others, citizens of Michigan, for national protection of women's right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the petition of Mrs. O. A. C. Wood and others, of Pennsylvania, asking the same protection for women in the exercise of their right to vote that colored men now enjoy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that petition read.

Mr. SCOTT. So should I, for I found it on my table and have not examined its contents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In the name of justice and right, we ask of Congress at its present session to pass a declaratory act that under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution women have the right to the elective franchise.

Mr. SCOTT. The indorsement upon that petition, perhaps, is not a correct summary of its contents as required by the rule; and, in explanation, I would state that I found it on my desk without having had time to read it, with a request from Miss Anthony to present it. She is the author of the summary on the back of the petition which I read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The summary is considerably larger than the petition.

Mr. WEST. I should like to have the summary read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The summary will be read if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The paper is indorsed as follows:

Mrs. O. A. C. Wood and others, of Pennsylvania, asking the same protection for women in the exercise of their right to vote that colored men now enjoy.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, men and women, asking Congress to pass a declaratory law which shall guarantee to women full exercise of the right to the elective franchise in all the States and Territories of the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of Mrs. Sarah Burger Stearns and other citizens of Minnesota, asking Congress to pass a declaratory law which shall guarantee to women the full exercise of the right to the elective franchise in all the States and Territories of the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, transmitting correspondence relative to the reduction made by the House of Representatives in the appropriation for the preparation and publication of the Nautical Almanac; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, transmitting correspondence in relation to a claim made by the authorities of Charlestown, Massachusetts, to be reimbursed for expenses incurred in the improvement of that portion of Chelsea street which borders on the United States navy-yard; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the petition of Mrs. A. Sanford and 83 others, of Rhode Island, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Joshua Hill be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Amy A. Hough be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 238) permitting James McDonald, a warrant officer of the Navy, to accept a silver medal from the government of Italy, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, reported it with an amendment.

REPORT OF INDIAN EXPENDITURES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print the letter of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, transmitting copies of the accounts of all persons charged with the disbursement of moneys and property for the Indian service from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1872, to report against the printing of the document.

This report of the Second Auditor is made in conformity with the act of 1834 organizing the Indian Department, which requires that "copies of the expenditures of the Indian Department shall be annually laid before Congress at the commencement of the ensuing session by the proper accounting officers, together with a list of the names of all persons to whom money, goods, or effects had been delivered within said year for the benefit of Indians, specifying the amount and object for which it was intended, and showing who are delinquent, if any, in forwarding their accounts under the provisions of this act; and also a list of the names of all persons appointed or employed under this act, with the date of their appointment or employment, and the salary or pay of each."

This is doubtless a compliance with the law, but it does not furnish any information of value unless to an expert; and in the opinion of the Committee on Printing this voluminous document should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, where it may be examined, and it be ascertained whether the appropriations have all been expended according to law, and if any of them can be dispensed with hereafter. It gives such information as this—I have noted one or two instances—one account of an Indian agent of money expended for beneficial objects, $300; for pay of employés, $2,300; for traveling expenses, $284—it does not say where to, or where from; for repair of Government teams, $29; for subsistence, $20,998, and for transportation, $22,928. This report shows that all the money appropriated has been very faithfully drawn, no doubt, but it does not show how it has been expended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it does not show how it has been expended it does not comply with the law or the spirit of the law; and I ask my friend whether, according to the requirement of the act of 1834, this report shows who are delinquents in managing Indian affairs, and who have not properly settled their accounts, which is of the greatest importance to us. We are not looking after the just men, but the unjust, in these reports.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no doubt it does, though I have not examined it in that respect, because the letter from the Auditor says that this report is sent in compliance with this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator himself does not know where or in what part—and I do not blame him for not knowing—such a statement appears, (and I cannot find it in looking at the document,) I move that it be recommitted to the committee, in order that they may see that it does really comply with the law. Then they can report it to us, and we can determine whether it should be printed or not. If it does not contain a complete statement of the delinquencies, then the officers who have sent it here have failed in the performance of a very important duty, and they ought to be informed of it, and required to obey the law themselves, as well as ask other people to obey it.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to remark, before this matter passes away, that I am very anxious, for one, to have a publication of this kind. We should have a publication on this subject, and I will undertake to send out all the copies I can get into the Indian country, because I want the people out there to see the amount of money that has been expended in their neighborhood in the Indian country. I supposed under the law that we were going to get the other facts referred to as to whom money has been paid to. I think such a publication at this time will tend to develop a good many important facts. We shall get information that we should not otherwise get if we publish the amount expended, to whom paid out, and by whom received. It may cost something to do it, but I think it will save much in the end. I hope this report will not be passed over without such publication as will bring to light the amount of money that has been expended in the Indian country.

Mr. ALLISON. I think some publication ought to be made of the expenditures in the Indian Bureau; but I think we ought to have, if we print at all, more information than appears to be contained in the manuscript now submitted. To know that A B received $10,000 is not very important, unless we know what he gave in consideration for it. Therefore it seems to me that we had better refer this back to the Second Auditor, and let him send in another communication, giving us some detail of facts in relation to these expenses more than simply that A B and C D received so much money.

Mr. HOWE. I was inclined to think when I looked at these accounts—differently from the Senator from Rhode Island—that this report was not in accordance with the law, and I am quite clear that the Senator is right when he says that the publication of these accounts would furnish no sort of information of any practical value whatever. Every year you make certain appropriations for the Indian service, appropriations to carry out the provisions of Indian treaties; so much to be paid to such a tribe, under such a treaty, for such a purpose: to build mills, to support schools, to employ farmers—specific sums. Now these accounts show that the agents for these tribes draw their warrants for gross sums—so many thousand dollars. That money is put into their hands; and opposite that sum, with which the Treasury is credited, they enter the sum which the agent accounts for. He receives $40,000, and the Treasury credits itself with $40,000 paid to the agent. In the next column the agent is credited with having spent the $40,000; but where one single dollar of it went to, on what account it was expended, you cannot learn from that document—whether it went to a farmer, or to a miller, or to a school, or whether it was expended for beef or for flour. I do not think that is a compliance with the statute:

> All persons whatsoever, charged or intrusted with the disbursement or application of money, goods, or effects of any kind for the benefit of the Indians, shall settle their accounts annually at the War Department on the 1st day of October.

And these accounts shall be reported. I should suppose such an account ought to show that the agent had received the money which was appropriated, and that he had expended the money to satisfy the very appropriation, and present such vouchers as he could get. This report does not show any such thing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask the Senator, does the statute provide that a report of those accounts shall be made to Congress?

Mr. HOWE. The statutes provide—

> And copies of the same shall be laid annually before Congress at the commencement of the ensuing session by the proper accounting officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to this document being recommitted, but the committee presumed that it was transmitted in accordance with law. We did not examine it with a view of ascertaining that fact. What the committee had to do was to ascertain whether this document contained any information that would be worth the cost of printing it. That the committee decided in the negative very promptly. It seems to me that it would be best to refer this voluminous document to the Committee on Indian Affairs, that they may examine it, or appoint some expert to examine it, and ascertain whether the money has been properly appropriated and properly accounted for. Otherwise I see no use whatever in sending it to Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the question were one of printing, I should think it belonged to the Committee on Printing; but if it is one whether there has been a fair compliance on the part of the managers of the Indian Department with the law, and whether the information communicated is such as is beneficial to the public service, it seems to me it belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs. On the whole, I think the document should be sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs, who will examine it with a view of seeing whether it is of any practical importance as touching the Indian service; and I think it very likely that it might be very valuable, that is to say, if there has been a strict compliance with the law in furnishing us the evidence upon which the whole thing touches.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the duty of the Committee on Appropriations is to report, among other regular appropriation bills, the Indian appropriation bill. In passing upon that bill, and reporting it to the Senate, and explaining its terms, they are compelled to see that the treaties are followed, that the amount owing to any particular tribe or individual by law is appropriated; and they have necessarily a greater familiarity with the appropriations than the Committee on Indian Affairs can have, or perhaps any other committee of this body. The Committee on Indian Affairs pass upon questions of general policy, whether this or that reservation ought to be established or abolished, whether this or that kind of treatment shall be extended towards the Indians. They do not have the examination or revision of the specific items of Indian appropriations. Now, if the object is to examine this document and see if it contains a report in detail or satisfactory of the expenditures of the moneys appropriated at the last session of Congress for the benefit of the Indian service, it seems to me that the committee most familiar with the subject and most able to give an intelligent opinion on the document to the Senate is the Committee on Appropriations. I therefore trust, if it is to be referred for that purpose, it will go to the Committee on Appropriations, which reports the annual Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am quite indifferent where it goes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate is not quite indifferent where it goes. I find in one of these statements that there is a column which purports to be "moneys appropriated and unaccounted for," which I suppose the Department imagine is a compliance with the act of 1834. I do not think it is; because they ought to state what has become of the subject, and why the money has not been accounted for and returned to the Treasury or expended. But in this one statement, which is a small part of the batch, as you can see, I find in the recapitulation that for the year ending the 30th of June, 1872, the amount of money paid out from the Treasury for the Indian service, and not accounted for in that one year, is $159,538.38.

Now, what I for one wish to have the Committee on Printing to do is, to take these papers which have been referred to them and go over them, as they are entirely able to do, with sufficient particularity to be enabled at least to report a resolution that this table of delinquencies, with the names of the delinquents and the date of delinquency, shall be printed for the use of the Senate and the information of the public, so that we may be able to advise the Indian Department or the Department of the Interior in what way we are to recover this public money or have it accounted for. Somebody ought to be responsible for so large a loss in one year as $159,000—almost $160,000. Very likely it may turn out, and I hope it will, that this really overrates the amount of loss, and that it may merely consist in unsettled accounts; but when we get the document printed, and can all see it, we can then instruct the Committee on Indian Affairs to make inquiry into this subject through the Department, and ascertain what the truth really is. What this other vast mass contains, how much the delinquencies are there, I do not know; but for this single year there is so much. Therefore I think it proper that the document should be sent back to the Committee on Printing, that they may recommend the printing of such parts of it as show the amounts of money we have apparently lost, and in what way, so far as they can, we have lost them.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that a detailed report, with vouchers, with all the explanations that are stated en masse in this voluminous document, would make twenty volumes. I do not know but that I got myself into difficulty by offering any explanations if it is going back to the Committee on Printing; but I think the proper committee would be the Committee on the Judiciary, because the laws would have to be altered in some respect if this report is not correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why so?

Mr. ANTHONY. The law is not sufficiently stringent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The law is sufficiently stringent, but the Committee on Printing do not enforce it. That is the trouble.

Mr. ANTHONY. But it would require some penalties which the Committee on the Judiciary should prescribe for the delinquencies of the office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The law already prescribes the punishment of offenders against the United States in not accounting for public money, and my friend ought to know it. I assure him that there is law enough to compel the Interior Department and the Indian Department not to squander money. But I do not mean by this even to have it suspected that I suppose it to be squandered; but I say in the first place that they ought to be made to comply with the law, and then the Committee on Printing ought to enable us to see in print the report which they make to us, or the substance of this report, so that we may understand ourselves the propriety of having an inquiry into the subject of these apparently vast delinquencies. That is all.

I have no quarrel with my friend from Rhode Island. I should be glad to have his whole committee referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It might improve the composition of that body very considerably, perhaps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the communication be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF PROPERTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am authorized by the Committee on the Judiciary, rather informally to be sure—but my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] is anxious to obtain the information that he called for the other day—to return the resolution introduced by that Senator, asking the Attorney-General for certain statements about the Harper's Ferry property, with the recommendation that it be amended by striking out the word "detailed," so that it shall read "a statement of all the information," and then that it pass. I am informed by the Department of Justice that there is no objection to any part of the proceedings being made public, and I only move to strike out the word "detailed," in order to save a great deal of clerkly writing that will amount to nothing at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont reports from the Committee on the Judiciary a resolution, and asks its present consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be directed to furnish the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, a detailed statement of all the information in his office relative to the sale of the Government property at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, and all suits in relation to said property, whether for purchase-money or otherwise.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, being to strike out the word "detailed" before "statement," was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a great number of petitions on the subject and also a bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, have had the same under consideration and instructed me to report the bill back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill, and to ask that the bill as thus amended shall pass. I desire to say that, in view of the great number of petitioners, their respectability, and the very clear justice of what they ask in the provisions of this bill, I shall take the earliest opportunity to call it up and ask for its passage.

The bill was placed on the Calendar, and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

DAVID BRADEN.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims instruct me to report a bill on the petition of David Braden. The committee find in favor of the claim, and instruct me to report a bill allowing Mr. Braden $1,058; and at the request of the Senators from Indiana I desire to make a statement.

In the Forty-first Congress this bill was reported upon from the Committee on Military Affairs favorably, and then left upon the table without action. At the last Congress the Committee on Claims of the Senate reported again in favor of the bill for the relief of Mr. Braden, and it passed the Senate. It went to the House, and passed the House on the 3d day of March, just at the close of the last Congress. It did not reach the President in time for his signature. At their request, inasmuch as this bill has been reported upon favorably twice in the Senate, and has passed both Houses, and failed to receive the approval of the President only because it did not reach him in time, I ask that the bill be put on its passage now. It is for $1,058, a small amount, and I think the business of the Senate will justify me in asking for action on it at once.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the bill will be passed. It has been long delayed.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no idea of voting against the bill; but it will be some satisfaction to know upon what the claim is founded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have it explained, subject to objection, so that it may go over after the explanation if there be objection.

The bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden, was read twice. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to David Braden, late captain and assistant adjutant-general of volunteers, for commutation of quarters and fuel and three months' extra pay, under the act of March 3, 1865, the sum of $1,058.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us hear it explained.

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill itself is the best explanation. The substance of it is that this party claims to be entitled to three months' extra pay, and to the commutation spoken of; and the testimony clearly establishes that he has not been paid this three months' extra pay, nor has he been paid this commutation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How did it happen that he was not paid? Why did he not get the money as other people did?

Mr. WRIGHT. The difficulty was this: he was detailed by order of the Secretary of War to act as provost-marshal, and it was decided by the Department that inasmuch as he was thus detailed, though he was acting by the order of his superior officer, he was not entitled to this extra pay; nor was he entitled to commutation, for the reason that he was thus detailed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To whom was the extra pay to be given?

Mr. WRIGHT. To this officer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I mean by the law. You say he was not entitled to it because he was detailed to act as provost-marshal. Now, what class of people were entitled to it?

Mr. WRIGHT. Officers and soldiers were entitled to three months' extra pay under section 4 of the act of 1864, as I now remember.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What were they to be doing to be entitled to it?

Mr. WRIGHT. There was no provision on that subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to discuss this matter with my friend; I only desire information; but if this gentleman—being an officer in the Army—was by statute entitled, while a soldier, to three months' extra pay at his discharge, it seems very strange indeed that because he was detailed to special service he did not come within the law, unless the law says that people detailed for special service do not come within it. Can my friend state the substance of the act of 1864; and can he also at the same time tell us whether the money this gentleman received as provost-marshal was or was not in excess of the regular pay of the grade to which he really belonged?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state that he was detailed by order of the Secretary of War to act as provost-marshal for the sixth district of Indiana, and he did serve as such. He served also until the close of the war and until he was discharged in December, 1865. Now the Department decides that, inasmuch as he was thus detailed as provost-marshal, and whatever his pay as provost-marshal, he was not entitled to the three months' extra pay given to soldiers under this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not answer my question; that is, how did his pay as provost-marshal compare with the regular rate he would have received had he been in the field, acting in his proper grade according to his proper rank?

Mr. WRIGHT. My recollection is that his pay as provost-marshal was perhaps about the same as his pay as assistant adjutant-general. He was acting as assistant adjutant-general in the Army at the time he was thus detailed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does the pay of an assistant adjutant-general compare with the pay of the rank this man actually held?

Mr. WRIGHT. About the same, as I understand. I do not see, however, that it makes any difference whether it was more or less, for the reason that, whatever pay he may have received after that, he was entitled to this three months' extra pay as assistant adjutant-general under the law. Now the Department decides that because he was thus detailed he was not entitled to the three months' extra pay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator please read us the law, and then we will understand it?

Mr. WRIGHT. That law will be found in the thirteenth volume of the Statutes. I have it not before me now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFISCATION OF UNDERVALUED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 85) explanatory of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1799; and also of the act entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, to report it back without amendment; and as it is of some public importance, I will ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that nothing contained in the sixty-sixth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1799, shall be so construed as to vitiate or involve the confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued, but that such confiscation shall only apply to the merchandise actually undervalued in the entered invoice; and so much of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, is in like manner to be construed as provided for in the foregoing portion of this section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say that in the opinion of the Finance Committee this bill does not change the law from what it now is; and it has also been decided that this is the law by the Supreme Court of the United States by a decision made by Mr. Justice Clifford. But there has been a diversity of ruling in the Department in relation to the matter; and in order to set it at rest, that only the article in the invoice that is undervalued is to be confiscated or subjected to penalty, this bill is reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is it about carriages on the northern frontier?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This merely relates to the general law upon the subject of invoices.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there not some danger that you are opening the door there to non-confiscation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say that so far as the committee have investigated it, they believe that the bill ought to be passed, and ought to be passed now; and the opinion of the Department is to the same effect.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH NOCK.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 157) for the relief of Joseph Nock, and the memorial of this claimant, dated May 9, 1872, addressed to the Committees on Claims of the two Houses of Congress, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report the bill back to the Senate without amendment, and to recommend its indefinite postponement, and that the memorial of the claimant be disallowed.

It is proper that I should add a word of explanation. I want to make a final disposition of this case, if it be possible to do that. It has been before Congress, at different intervals, from the year 1841 to this present year of grace. It has been twice before the Court of Claims under a reference of Congress, and, at the December term, 1866, a decision was rendered awarding to Mr. Nock some $27,000. That judgment has been paid. It has been acquiesced in, the money received under it, and the judgment fully discharged. He does not, in his present memorial or in his papers, make any reference to that decision; but in the investigation of the case I came across the decision rendered by the Court of Claims. He claims in his present memorial, and in the bill that has been introduced by my friend from Iowa, some $300,000, making no allowance whatever for what has been paid already under the decision of the Court of Claims.

Now, if there be any mode of legislation by which we can put a finality to this claim, I shall beg some Senator to make the requisite motion, so that we shall render judgment against this claimant perpetually. Congress has been teased with this case since 1841. The reports made by the different committees to whom it has been referred make a respectable volume. It was once referred to the Solicitor of the Treasury, and he occupied twenty-nine closely printed pages in discussing Mr. Nock's claim. My present motion is for the indefinite postponement of the bill and the disallowance of the memorial.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the bill be rejected. That is the best way.

Mr. PRATT. Very well; let the bill be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If there is any motion that would be more decisive I should like to know what it is. I know of other claims of a similar character that I dare say antedate this very much in antiquity, that have been floating around this Chamber for thirty years, and have come up fresh twice since the Forty-first Congress, and have been reported upon, not only adversely, but with very great emphasis, with a view of putting a final end to them, and yet they return here to trouble us constantly. I dare say they will appear here again at this session, though they were reported on adversely at the last session. I do not know that there is any remedy, and I doubt if there is. If this claim be rejected, at the next session it will be taken from the files and referred to another committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The remedy is apparent enough.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. By a rule of the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Indiana, while he is desiring to accomplish the same purpose that I have, has perhaps failed to employ the very words that are necessary to do all that he can do to prevent a repetition of this same report. The proper motion to make to bring it within the rule will be that the report be adopted. That, under the rule of the Senate, prevents the claim from being again taken from the files of the Senate unless there be a new petition stating that there is new evidence to be brought before the committee. I trust that will be the motion the Senator will make, that the report be adopted.

Mr. PRATT. I will substitute that motion.

Mr. HOWE. Now let me suggest to both the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Indiana that their own ample experience should instruct them how inadequate will be the security even of that motion, because any morning a Senator who knows nothing about the history of the claim may be invited to just ask to have an order made to have the papers in such a case taken from the files and referred to a committee. As a matter of courtesy he does it. He does not know whether there has been a report or not, and, in the hurry of business, the question is not asked. So the case again goes to a committee. I do not know of any adequate security against the repetition of these claims, unless you require by statute upon the recommittal of a claim which has once been rejected that the claimant shall pay costs; if rejected again, and he appears the third time, that he shall be sent to the State prison; and if he appears a fourth time, he shall be hanged, [laughter;] and in process of time you will get rid of such claimants if you enforce such a law.

Mr. SCOTT. I am entirely aware that perhaps even the ingenuity of the Senator from Wisconsin will not enable us to get rid of the provision which authorizes citizens to come here by petition and ask for a redress of grievances; but I have endeavored to make it as public as possible that the Committee on Claims will do all they can do, under Rule 49 of the Senate, to prevent the reference of claims that have already been passed upon; and, even at the risk of repeating it, I will again give notice that where Rule 49 of the Senate is violated, even unknowingly, by members of the Senate, where a claim is referred which has been previously rejected, it receives no examination whatever in the committee; but the simple fact that it has been rejected, and that it comes back without the petition required by the rule, will be acted upon, and it will be reported back without any examination of the papers whatever. So that Senators who are appealed to to get an order for the reference of papers will not be conferring any advantage upon their friends unless they first ascertain whether there has been an adverse report. I hope the report in this case will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question on this bill is, Shall it be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the motion was to adopt the report.

Mr. SCOTT. The motion now is that the report be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the attitude of the matter to be this: The Committee on Claims report back a bill and ask for its present consideration with a view to have it rejected for reasons assigned in the report. The way to accomplish this, as the Chair understands, is to put the question on the third reading of the bill, and if that is voted down the bill cannot go to its passage, but is rejected, and that adopts the report. The question is on reading the bill the third time.

The question being put, it was decided in the negative. So the bill was rejected and the adverse report adopted.

Mr. PRATT. I did not make a formal motion that the report in this case, which I have taken some pains to write, be printed. I submit that motion now.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN COLTER.

Mr. FENTON. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 131) for the relief of John Colter, having considered the same, report it back, and recommend that it do not pass, for the reasons set forth in a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which accompanies this report. I should be glad, unless some Senator asks for the reading of the Commissioner's letter, to have action upon the report now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that the motion that ends all controversy; or ought not the vote to be taken on the third reading of the bill, and have it rejected?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Technically, the Chair understands that the bill is rejected by the Senate refusing to read it a third time. The Senator from New York reports from the Committee on Finance the bill indicated by him, and asks for its present consideration with a view to its being rejected. The Chair will put the question on the third reading of the bill.

The question was put, and determined in the negative. So the bill was rejected.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 354) for the relief of Jordan & McPike; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. This bill was once reported in the House of Representatives from the Committee on Claims by Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It was examined and carefully reported upon. At the last session of Congress I introduced it here, but our committee did not have time to examine it. I hope the committee will now examine it carefully. It is certainly a very meritorious claim, and the report made by Mr. WILLARD was very carefully prepared. I now move that the papers in this case be withdrawn from the files, and referred, with the bill, to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 355) to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Oregon by reason of Indian depredations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 356) to authorize the construction of a breakwater at Port Orford, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 357) to provide for a geological survey of the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CROZIER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 358) to amend an act to provide for the establishment of a military prison, and for its government, approved March 3, 1873; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 359) to incorporate the Colorado and New Mexico Railway Company, and to grant the right of way over the public lands; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That bill ought to go to the Committee on Territories, if it is to incorporate a railway in the Territories.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well; I have no objection to that reference.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Territories.

JUDICIAL EXPENSES IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether the judicial expenses for the Territory of Washington may be properly diminished by reducing the number of places for holding court in that Territory, or otherwise, and to report thereon.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That it shall not be lawful for the Congressional Printer to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any speech, or portion of a speech, not actually delivered in the Senate or in the House of Representatives.

I shall not ask for its present consideration, but that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1393) providing for the assignment of judges in the Territories; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 215) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the resolution reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, it is scarcely possible to overstate the importance, I might add the dryness, of a variety of topics embraced by the resolution and the proposed amendments to it, now under consideration. They affect in a high degree, either directly or indirectly, every material interest of the people and the Government, and they merit the most serious and scrutinizing consideration. This protracted debate, therefore, will not be in vain; on the contrary, I trust it will result in the permanent advancement of the general good. I do not flatter myself with the hope that I shall be able to offer anything very new. I venture to trust, however, that I shall be able to present some pertinent thoughts in a new light, and thus aid in the discharge of a duty which devolves upon us all, not free from embarrassment; and I invoke the patience of the Senate while I state what I have to say as strongly and briefly as possible, to make myself understood.

All experience goes to show that it is very difficult to ascertain and correctly measure the economical relations, necessities, and wants of society, especially under a high state of rapidly advancing civilization; and, however difficult such an undertaking may be, it is less so than that of supplying such wants through the instrumentalities of Government. This remark applies to all peoples in all times, and with peculiar force and point to our own country. These difficulties and these peculiarities that apply to us arise from a multiplicity and diversity of causes and considerations which underlie our whole fabric of society and government, and may be aptly termed fundamental facts; and they are such as Congress cannot ignore in devising and establishing a monetary system, without hazarding the most important rights of the people.

I have said that these causes and considerations are fundamental in their character, and I desire to advert to them briefly at the very outset of what I have to say, because, in my judgment, they materially affect the moral, the intellectual, the physical, and the material interests of the whole country; and in no respect are they more important, and ought they to be more cautiously considered, than in devising and establishing a monetary system for the country. It is because I desire to draw attention to them particularly, and ask the Senate to keep them steadily in view, that I refer to them in the very outset and treat them as fundamental.

It ought never to be lost sight of in discussions of this sort that we are comparatively a new people. We are less than a century old. The United States have just begun the race of nations; yet what do we behold? They have a population of 41,000,000 people; they have a territorial area of more than three and a half millions of square miles, stretching from the Atlantic Ocean on the east to the Pacific on the west, from the great lakes, including Alaska, on the north to the Gulf of Mexico and Mexico on the south. They embrace almost every variety of soil and climate, and their productions are as varied as their soil and climate. The advancement that they have made is wonderful in all the departments of industrial pursuit, as well as in the progress of general civilization. They have vast navigable lakes, rivers, and seas. They have more than 60,000 miles of railway already completed, half as many more projected, with a large percentage of those in process of construction, and more than 70,000 miles of telegraph lines. Their agricultural pursuits are extremely varied. In one locality the staple is sugar; in another it is rice; in another tropical and semi-tropical fruits; in another cotton; in another tobacco; in another hemp; in another Indian corn; in another wheat; and these and many more productions are raised in all sections more or less. Our mineral resources are almost unparalleled by those of any country in the world for kind, quality, and supply. We have copper, iron, lead, gold, and silver. Our mines are inexhaustible. We have sufficient deposits of coal to supply the whole world for centuries. The rapid accumulation of our wealth is astonishing to every economist. Although, as I said a moment ago, this Government is less than a century old, yet the aggregate value of our real and personal property is more than $40,000,000,000; the annual productions of the country are in the neighborhood of $6,000,000,000; and the increase has gone on with a rapidity that is astonishing to contemplate. Our imports and exports amount to more than $1,200,000,000 per annum. We are a highly commercial people, and in the highway of nations. In some localities our population is dense; in others it is less so; in others still it is sparse. In one section, as I have remarked, a high state of commercial activity prevails, in another we have manufacturing interests wonderful in their extent and rapidly increasing, and we have a multitude of employments throughout the vast extent of our country. Our intercommunication in some localities is very rapid; in others it is slow; and in others it is slower still. Our material development is just begun.

These peculiar characteristics and resources appear in a stronger light when we contrast them with those of some of the other great commercial nations of the earth.

Take England, for example—I speak of England proper. England has a population of 21,000,000; it has a territorial area of a fraction over 50,000 square miles; it is just about the size of my own State. There is little variety in its climate. The whole country is densely populated; they have vast commercial and manufacturing cities and towns; their means of communication are rapid and great; they have the greatest facilities; and they communicate with the whole civilized world. Their country is developed. I am proud to say for our own country that we are abreast in the march of civilization with England and the other nations of the earth; but England is a developed country. It is to-day comparatively an ancient country. They have had all the advantages of the civilization that preceded the time when we had no existence as a people at all; and yet we are up with them in many respects, and far ahead of them in many others.

Take the British isles together. They have a population of 31,000,000. They have a territorial area of 120,000 square miles, a little more than double the area of my own State. There is comparatively little variety of soil; but the population in the greater portion of the various localities is dense; their intercommunication is rapid and great, and their facilities increase in that respect constantly.

Take France as another illustration of the force of the peculiar characteristics that I have attributed to our own country. France has a population of 37,000,000, and a territorial area of 190,000 square miles. It is also an ancient, developed country. They have considered and availed themselves of every economical advantage. Their intercommunication is great. There is a great sameness in their wants. They understand applied labor and the co-operative system of labor more thoroughly than we do in this country.

In view of this contrast, is not the advancement that this country has made wonderful, and is it astonishing that our wants have kept pace with the advancement we have thus made?

Mr. President, these facts go to show that our country is emphatically a commercial country as well as a producing country. We enjoy the advantage of being a highly commercial people as well as a manufacturing and producing people. We embody every advantage that a nation could possess. I believe I do not venture too much when I say that we are blessed richly above all other nations upon the face of the globe!

If this is true, we are in the highway of nations; we are of the nations of the earth; we are of the commercial peoples of the world; and we are bound by the great laws of commerce that permeate civilization, and which are not written in statute-books. There are certain laws of commerce that permeate civilization, that go wherever commerce goes, that control and direct its interests, that are not made by congresses, or parliaments, or legislatures. They are written, as it were, by the finger of God when He organized society in pursuance of His eternal will. These laws of commerce are universal. We cannot escape from them if we would. If we were to pass a statute here to-day denying their validity, the forces of commerce, the forces of society, would revoke it, and it would be a virtual nullity or our nation would be ground to powder in resisting their force.

One of the great necessities of society, especially of commerce, is a means of exchange. I need not here go into an explanation of what is meant by exchange, although I beg pardon for adverting to some fundamental principles, because I have always found that in resorting to such principles I generally come to more correct conclusions. Commerce requires a medium of exchange. If there was no medium of exchange the world would have no exchange but barter, and the interest, not only of this country, but of all countries, would be greatly impaired in that respect. Commercial nations, therefore, have not been slow to devise a means of exchange. What is that means of exchange? It is money. What, then, is money? A general definition of it would be that it is the means of exchange; but it means much more than that. Money implies essential value. It is of the essence of money that it shall have value in it; and the experience of the world from the earliest periods down to the present time is that nothing constitutes this medium of exchange except gold and silver; and because coin has thus been designated by the growth of commerce, by what I may term the eternal laws of commerce, it is valuable as a medium of exchange at all times, in all countries, and under all circumstances. Money implies essential value, and it is not affected in this respect by war or by peace; it is not affected by prosperity or adversity; it is not affected by one country or by another country. Wherever it is seen, wherever it makes its appearance, it has value in it.

If one who holds money—and there is no money but gold and silver, and I wish that steadily kept in view—were to take his gold or silver and lock it up in his coffers and keep it there until the day of his death, and his children were to keep it a generation after he died, it would be just as valuable to effect exchanges at the end of a century as it was the day it was put there. Though wars should come, though pestilence should come, it would still preserve its value. The reason of that is that it is universally recognized as the medium of exchange by all the world; and we find that for the normal condition of commerce there is about a sufficient quantity of the precious metals found in the world to answer this purpose; and this is so verily and completely so that it would seem that the Almighty had provided these substances to answer this very purpose.

I make these remarks, Mr. President, for the purpose of directing the attention of the Senate to the fact, which is material for my purpose, that there is no money of commerce, there is no standard of value but gold and silver; and though Congress should pass a law to-morrow declaring that gold and silver should not be used for the purposes of exchange, that coin should be driven from the country, such a statute would be practically a nullity; for if a citizen of this country in that case should have a gold coin in his pocket, whether it be a British coin, or an American coin, or a French coin, it still would have value in spite of the statute. It might be that the law would crush out the use of it here, but in the other nations of the earth it would pass as current as coin does here this day.

But, Mr. President, this is not only the medium of exchange established by the laws of commerce, which are irrepealable, which are not written in statute-books, but the founders of our Constitution recognized it as the only true and lawful medium. Look at the debates upon this subject in the Convention that framed the Constitution, and it will be seen that they so recognized it. They provided in the Constitution, having in view that state of commercial and industrial prosperity that we experience to-day, that the national Government alone should have the power to coin money and to regulate its value. Furthermore they provided that the Congress should have the power to pass laws providing for the punishment of those who should counterfeit it. The Constitution provides further, having again in view this mighty commerce that we enjoy to-day, that the States should not have the power to make anything else a legal tender in discharge of debts but gold and silver. It was not only so understood by the framers of our Constitution; it was not only so written in the Constitution itself, but the practice of our Government, from its earliest existence down to the time the late war broke out, sustained the Constitution and the policy inaugurated by the framers of the Government.

A point I wish to make here and to draw attention to is this, that it is impossible to make any other medium of exchange equal to this in point of value and in the power to purchase and to effect exchanges. Am I correct in that? Let me illustrate to make my point more forcible.

There is a person who is known to have in his coffers $10,000 in gold coin; he is known to be a person of the highest integrity, who performs his promises, and discharges his obligations regularly when made. He issues his promise to pay, evidenced by a paper writing in the shape of a bank-note. In this case, it must be seen that the paper is presently convertible into specie; but is that paper as good as the coin? Manifestly not. Why? Peradventure the man, though he has the gold in his coffers, and has the integrity in his heart, and would redeem his promise, may die before the holder of his promise to pay can present it, in which case the administrator could not pay it presently. Peradventure, misfortune may occur; a fire may burn up all his wealth. Perhaps a devastating army may pass along and capture or destroy all his wealth. In that case, even where the party had the gold in his coffers, where he had all the integrity and all the willingness to pay, the paper promise is not equal to the gold.

Let us take another case to make this view stronger still. This person, let us say, has great wealth; he has lands, horses, goods in great variety; he is a man of high integrity, but he has no gold. He issues his promise to pay in like manner. That promise to pay is still less valuable. Why? Because the holder, when he presents it, knows that he cannot get the gold for it. He knows that he will have to wait an indefinite time for it; he may not get it when he wants it; he would therefore prefer the coin in hand; then there could be no hazard.

I put these cases to show that it is practically impossible to make any credit currency equal to gold and silver, and therefore I say, with all respect, the gentlemen who take a different view and who insist that we can make our present currency—to which I shall advert more at large presently—equal to gold and silver, undertake to accomplish that which is impossible in the very nature of things. It is beyond possibility to make our present credit currency equal to gold and silver, and, in my judgment, it is idle to talk about it. It never has been done in any like case in the history of the world; it never will or can be done.

Without going into the matter of our currency, I will refer to it here very briefly to illustrate the point I am upon. I think we have a country that enjoys the confidence of its people about as largely as any country upon the face of the earth. It has performed wonders in preserving the life of the nation. It has the vast resources of which I have spoken. It was forced to issue a currency called "greenbacks." With all the credit of this nation, with all its capacity to pay, with all the chivalry of its people to back it, with the honor of its Congress, and with the honor and faith of its people plighted, what has been the character of this currency? From the day it was issued down to this time it has averaged a less value than the gold standard by 20 per cent. That is not stating the fact too strongly. It has been less valuable than gold by 20 per cent. It never came below 8 per cent. It did go down to 8 per cent. in November last, I believe, but that was under a peculiar stress of circumstances, during the panic. In a normal state of things it has never come nearer in the general average to the standard of gold than 20 per cent., if that. If, then, we have such credit; if there are such circumstances to encourage a currency of this sort, and still the difference is an average of 20 per cent. between the gold standard and the value of "greenbacks," who can say with any show of reason that it is possible under any circumstances to make a credit currency equal to gold?

One gentleman said, the other day, "Contract the currency and you will get it down." You might reduce the volume to $100,000,000 and it would not be any nearer gold than it is to-day; for although $100,000,000 distributed over this country might make prices and property higher, gold would still preserve its relative relation to greenbacks; there would be the same average difference, the same per centage of difference, between gold and greenbacks in that case that exists to-day. The point I wish to make is, that it is idle, it is worse than idle, it is a mockery, and it is criminal for Congress, to undertake to bring greenbacks up to the standard of value that is established by gold and silver; and, in my judgment, we ought not to talk or think about it any longer.

Then, sir, according to all experience, according to the spirit of the framers of our Constitution, according to the Constitution itself, according to the practice of our Government, according to reason and truth, in order to put ourselves upon a level with the commercial nations of the earth, and in order to avail ourselves of the advantages of the laws of commerce, which are irrepealable, in order to make our people equal with other peoples, what do we want? We want a gold and silver basis of exchange, and we will never be upon an equality with the nations of the earth, we can never have the complete advantages of commerce, until we return to it; and, therefore, I say we ought to return to the specie basis as soon as it may be done consistently with the circumstances of the country; and I will allude to these more fully after a little while.

I repeat, that the point I wish to make here is—and I desire to keep it steadily before the Senate—that nothing is money but gold and silver, that nothing is recognized by the commercial world but gold and silver, and that we cannot have the advantages of the laws of commerce until we establish a medium of exchange based upon these.

We had this species of exchange down to 1861. In 1860, growing out of the long agitation of the slavery question, the country was precipitated into a revolution, and a civil war resulted of vast proportions. The very existence of the Government was jeopardized. Its warmest and most devoted friends at times almost desponded and trembled, and feared for the result. What was the effect of that war upon the money of the country? The effect of it was, as is the effect of all wars, to drive specie, (gold and silver,) which is always timid, into the coffers of the banks and of those who held it. That result grew out of the fact that men are careful of what is valuable to them; they take care of that, whatever else may come. There is another consideration that leads to it. When a state of war prevails the country is in an unnatural condition; the monetary wants of the people, the Government, are greatly multiplied; and then the volume of exchange must be suddenly and largely increased. The wants of the country become so great that the money in it, if it could be had, is not sufficient to supply the unnatural demand at the time the war happens and during its progress. It has been seldom in the history of nations that a nation could conduct a war using only gold and silver to effect its exchanges. In the present high state of civilization, I venture to say there is not a nation on earth that could do it. What was the result then? The result was what always happens—gold and silver went out of circulation. What was the Government forced to do? The Government was forced to resort to a credit currency—to a forced loan upon the people.

The result of the war was an increase of the public debt, a mighty increase; and let me at this point state it correctly. By reason of the war, including the debt that was in existence at the time the war began, the public debt on the 1st of January, 1874, was $2,291,792,287.60. Of this debt $1,722,206,950 bears coin interest. There are $14,678,000 bearing interest payable in greenbacks. There are $11,070,880.26 upon which interest has ceased to accrue; and there are $501,289,436.90 that bear no interest. The debt makes up the aggregate amount I have stated.

The country was not only forced to incur this debt in order to suppress the revolution in the South, but they had to adopt a currency to answer the purposes of exchange. There was no gold and silver to answer such purpose, and, as I have said, they were forced to use a credit currency.

Let me remark here that that is the currency of the poorest value of any. There are four sorts of currency. There is a value currency, that is, gold and silver. There is a pure credit currency, as in the case of our greenback. There is a mixed currency, and this is a currency that is founded upon gold and silver, and convertible into these. There is a commercial currency, which is bills of exchange, drafts drawn upon actual value, &c. The least valuable of all these currencies is the pure credit currency, and that is the currency that the Government was forced to adopt in order to carry on the war.

How much of that was provided? Four hundred and fifty million dollars of legal-tender notes—greenbacks as they are commonly called; $50,000,000 of this sum was a temporary loan; $400,000,000 was the maximum of the circulation. Under the law that authorized a contraction of the volume of the currency, $44,000,000 were withdrawn from the circulation, and that is what is commonly called in the debate here the "reserve fund" in the Treasury. So that the amount of this credit currency out at this time properly, is $356,000,000. But that $356,000,000 was found inadequate to answer the purposes of the Government and the country, and hence our present banking system was devised and established, a wise system in view of the exigencies of the country and the circumstances at the time it was established. By this banking system there was added to the volume of greenback currency $354,000,000 of bank or national currency circulation. Then there were $50,000,000 of fractional currency to answer the smaller purposes of exchanges. Then, what is the volume of this credit currency? Let us see. The bank circulation authorized by law is $354,000,000; the greenback circulation is $356,000,000; the fractional currency circulation is $50,000,000. These added together make $760,000,000, and that is the gross volume of currency circulation allowed by law in this country. By a provision in the national banking law the banks are required to keep on hand a reserve fund in greenbacks, legal-tender notes. That reserve is equal to $200,000,000, and that much of the greenback circulation is not in circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to correct my friend on that point, because I know he does not want to be in error.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am sure I do not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Three-fifths of that reserve, as it is called, may be in the form of credits and not in the form of greenbacks; and therefore only so much of it as is maintained in the form of greenbacks, in what is called the reserve of the banks, is withdrawn from the general circulation of the country.

Mr. MERRIMON. What amount, then, will the Senator say is in circulation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can give the Senator the precise amount in a moment. I will send for the report.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will thank him to do so. But I have put it down at $200,000,000, and I will go on with my calculation. If the Senator corrects me, I will accept his correction. Deducting that $200,000,000 the circulation of the country is $560,000,000. That is the volume of our circulation at this time, exclusive of the $44,000,000 of reserve which are going into circulation at this time. A large percentage of it is already out, I believe.

Now, Mr. President, the point I desire to make here, and I wish to make it as clearly and as strongly as I can, is this: that when there was a suspension of specie payment in the fall of 1861, and the greenback system was devised, this country adopted a medium of exchanges entirely distinct, less valuable, upon a different basis from gold and silver, and in substitution for these.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can give the Senator the statement now if he desires it. The total amount of legal-tender notes held by the banks as part of their reserve at the time of this report, dated September 12, 1873—the last official statement we have—was $92,347,663. That was the aggregate held by nineteen hundred and seventy-six banks, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. MERRIMON. I suppose, then, it would be fair to say there are a hundred millions retired in that way?

Mr. SHERMAN. About that.

Mr. MERRIMON. That would leave in circulation $660,000,000, if they were all out and employed. But there is a very large percentage of circulation that is not employed at any time; much of it is hoarded, and it is not active, for many considerations that are manifest to any one acquainted with such subjects.

But to go back to the point I was at: I say that, when the greenback or legal-tender system was adopted, growing out of the exigencies of the country, the necessity of the times, a different medium of exchange was established by law in this country, and it was a medium of exchange founded entirely upon credit. What was the effect of that? The effect was what I stated awhile ago, to wit, a currency less valuable than gold—a currency that has averaged, from the time of its adoption until now, when you measure it by gold, a less value than gold of more than 20 per cent. Its value has been 20 per cent. less than that of gold and silver.

Then, sir, in the first place, what do we see? The Government has had $400,000,000 of the people's money without interest from the time this greenback system began, in 1862, until now. What does this interest amount to? Sixty-six per cent. of the whole amount. The people, in the first place, by reason of this credit currency, have been deprived of 66 per cent. of the gross amount from that day to this that they ought to have had in the way of interest. The Government has had that much of their money without interest or advantage of any kind; and more than this, they have been furnished with a currency 20 per cent. less valuable than that of other nations. I am not complaining. The exigencies of the country required that such shifts should be resorted to. There is a just ground of complaint, however, that I intended to mention by and by; but I will advert to it now—not to enlarge upon it—and it is this: Congress has not done its duty—I mean nothing offensive—in providing before this time for a return to specie payments. That is not the worst of it. The people have not only lost 66 per cent. of this $400,000,000, in interest due upon this forced loan, that in all fairness they were and are entitled to, but they have been furnished with a currency of less value than gold by 20 per cent. Make the calculation, and it will appear that the people of the United States have lost 20 per cent. from the time this system began in all their exchanges down to the present moment. If that were cast up it would amount to millions of dollars. That has been the effect of this pure credit system—the greenback system.

Notwithstanding this depreciation; notwithstanding the people have been deprived of the interest that they ought to have had upon this money; notwithstanding the pledges of the Government to redeem this currency, Congress has failed until now to adopt any means to relieve the people. What, then, is our present duty? The condition of the country at this time is what we have seen; it is not going to grow any better if Congress fails to take some remedial action. I said awhile ago some gentlemen propose to pursue some line of policy, irregular in its character, to force greenbacks up to the value of gold; they propose a policy by which you may squeeze, if I may be allowed that term, greenbacks up to the standard value of gold. That cannot be done. It is a practical impossibility, as I think I have shown; you cannot do it in the very nature of things. If this greenback system is to continue, this system of depreciation is to continue; and this forced loan is to continue, to the continued detriment of the people as one of the fruits and results of the war. The war is behind us; reconstruction is behind us; everything of the war is behind us save this forced loan; and I say that it is the duty of Congress to rid the country of that at the earliest possible moment.

But that is not all; the Government is solemnly pledged to do it. Then, sir, it is the duty, I believe everybody here concedes that it is the duty, of the Government to return to the specie basis, that recognized by the Constitution, as soon as practicable. How shall that be done? That is the great question. And what shall be done for the country between now and the time when specie payments shall be resumed?

My opinions, without very great experience, but with some reflection on my part, may not be worth a great deal; but I intend to express them frankly. I shall keep nothing back; and I have been surprised that in the discussion here I have not heard a single definite plan suggested by which the country can get back to specie payments; every one seems to dread to suggest a plan and a time.

I suggest this plan for getting back: The 4th day of July, 1876, is the centennial natal day of our independence. I trust, sir, that glorious events will transpire on that day, and among them I desire that this country shall return to specie payments on that day. How is that to be done? It is very easily done. One plan is this: let the gold accumulate in the Treasury; that is, the sum received over and above the amount necessary to pay the interest on the public debt until that day. If that is not sufficient, put upon the market a bond that will sell for gold at par—a 5 or 6 per cent. bond; put the money in the Treasury, and on the 4th day of July, 1876, let every greenback in the land be redeemed. What will be the result of that? The result of that will be that the banks of the country will get a large part of the gold, and they will have a dollar in coin for every dollar of their currency. Then I would provide by law that we should return to specie payments on the 4th day of July, 1876; and I would provide the gold for this purpose in the way I have indicated.

Some one may say, "If you allow the gold to accumulate in the Treasury you will not get interest;" or some one may say, "If you do not allow it to accumulate there and you put a bond on the market to borrow it, then you have to pay interest." Let us see what there is in that. As I have already said, the Government has had $400,000,000 from the people for eleven years without paying a dime of interest. Not only that, they have been given a currency that has been depreciated from that time to this at least 20 per cent. under the value of gold.

We have heard a great deal of boasting on the part of our republican friends that they have reduced the public debt $400,000,000. With all respect, I think that was an erroneous and unfortunate policy. The Government was pledged to pay these debts in gold, and it was solemnly pledged to return to specie payments at the earliest possible day. How dare the Government, or rather those who administered it, go on paying the public debt not due when it could not pay the debt that was due, and that it had promised and pledged its honor it would pay? If, sir, we should borrow $400,000,000, and return to specie payments in the way I have indicated, the debt would be just where it was at the time the Government began to reduce it. It is unwise to talk about a temporizing policy; it is trifling with a grave subject to talk about a policy by which you can get back to specie payments by making the greenbacks appreciate to gold value. You cannot do it. We are obliged to make sacrifices to get back to the old channels, and we may as well do it at one time as another, and the sooner the better; and you are bound to do it if you mean to redeem the pledges of the country.

This, then, is my plan for getting back to specie payments. I believe it can be done. If the Government shall resume specie payments at the time I indicate, let them require the banks to resume specie payments within two months after that period. When the greenbacks are returned to the Treasury they are to be canceled or burned—put an end to. Wipe out the credit currency system; it is our duty to get back to the gold and silver currency basis, the basis provided by the Constitution, and which is demanded by the highest interests of the industrial and commercial classes of this country.

This being my plan for getting back to specie payments, what is to be done in the mean time? That is very important to be considered. Let us carefully proceed with that consideration now.

When this greenback system was adopted, when this bloated currency was forced upon the country by the necessities of the war, the business of the country, the commerce of the country, the exchanges of the country, were measured by the new system—they were measured by greenbacks. The essential result of that was a bloated state of business; business got out of the usual channel; it was an abnormal state of things, and that state of things has continued from that day to this. The question, then, is, in view of the time I have indicated for a return to specie payments, what ought to be the volume of this currency in the mean time? I have said, or I have agreed to say, at the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the amount of currency in circulation now is $660,000,000. I insist that that is not sufficient to answer the purposes of exchanges in this country. And here let me remark that the amount of money which is wanted in the country is just the exact amount necessary to effectuate the exchanges. If we have more money than answers that purpose, then we have a redundancy, and that is so whether we have gold or whether you have a credit currency. Suppose you had to-day $1,200,000,000 of gold instead of $660,000,000 greenbacks and bank-notes, there would be a redundancy of gold in that case. It is true the superfluity of money would stimulate enterprise and thereby create an increased demand for exchanges—the exchanges would be increased; but still, unless the exchanges required the employment of $1,200,000,000 of gold, there would be a redundancy. It would go abroad, the people would indulge in luxuries, and all sorts of enterprises and speculations would spring up. It is not only so of gold, but it is so of any sort of currency that may be adopted—it is so with greenbacks. All the country wants is just a sufficient volume of currency to effect the exchanges. Whenever we arrive at that point you have got enough. If we go beyond that point we have redundancy.

Now let us see if there is too much currency in the country now. As I have said, we have agreed that there are $660,000,000 of currency in circulation in the United States. I insist that it is not enough. I insist that it is not enough by one hundred millions. That is my judgment. I may err, but I do not think I do. Why do I say that? I say it when I consider what was the amount of currency in circulation at the beginning of the war, and our increased wants. I am sustained in saying this by reason of the demand of the country, and the amount of greenbacks in circulation since the war. I am authorized to say it in view of the panics and the monetary distresses that the country has experienced repeatedly, and particularly after the contraction by the withdrawal of $44,000,000 from the circulation under the act of March 12, 1866.

What was the circulation just as the war broke out? Let us see. The currency circulation of the country in 1860 was $238,671,210. What was the state of the country at that time? The value of the real and personal property at that time was a fraction over sixteen billions. The productions of the country were not half what they are now, as the statistics show. The exchanges of the country were then not half what they are to-day. I doubt if I should state it too strongly if I should say they were not a third of what they are now. We have acquired more than ten millions of population since 1860. We have acquired new habits. In some localities the population has become more dense; in a portion of the country where there was no population at that time there is a vast population now, and cities and towns. Enterprise has been stimulated to a high degree; railroads have been built across the continent and in every direction; canals have been cut; business has increased with a rapidity that astonishes the most enthusiastic and advanced economist.

There is another thing to be considered. The currency at that time was not like the present currency. The currency the country had at that time was a mixed currency; it was a currency founded upon a gold and silver basis; it was convertible into coin; and the difference between the paper currency at that time and gold was nominal. Therefore it was a better currency, and it effected more exchanges upon that ground.

Suppose we say, then, that it should be simply double. If you simply double the currency we had at that time, and it was a currency founded on gold, we want now $577,342,420 to put us, according to that calculation, upon an equality with the country at that time. But if you add in the depreciation of the currency at this time at 20 per cent., then you want at this moment $692,810,904. But I say that that is making it too small. I say that the circumstances of the country now are such as that we need more than double the amount.

But gentlemen say that the currency is inflated at this moment. They say there is a vast amount of money concentrated in New York and New England. Let us see about that. I say that the accumulation of the currency of the country in New York and in the Eastern States is unnatural; it does not belong there. One reason why it has gone there is that the banks there have paid interest on deposits, and that led those who lived in the South and West who had surplus money, at the season of the year when large amounts of money to effect exchanges were not needed, to send it there to get interest, and the banks there loaned the money to adventurers in railroad and other speculations. There is another reason why it has gone there. There was not the distribution of the banking currency that was provided for by law at the time the acts passed creating the present banking system; and here I wish to call attention to that. The law provided—

That $150,000,000 of the entire amount of circulating notes authorized to be issued shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such State, District, and Territory.

And yet under the distribution of that currency, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut recieved $70,690,046 in excess of what the law allowed to those States. New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland received $9,416,503 more than by the law they were entitled to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to say that under the national banking law the banking capital of the State of Delaware is not one-half now what it was prior to the existence of that system. We have not half the banking capital under the national banking system in the State of Delaware that we had under our State banking system; and the consequence has been that our people have been driven, when they wished money, not to seek it from the banks, but to go into the public markets and buy it at an enormous premium. That has been the effect of this banking system so far as the State of Delaware is concerned.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to say to my friend that the statistics do not correspond with his recollection about the matter. The statistics here show that in 1862 Delaware had a bank circulation of $678,340.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Why, sir, we had in my town a bank whose capital was over $600,000—the Farmers' Bank of the State of Delaware, with her branches.

Mr. MERRIMON. These statistics show that the banking circulation of the State now is $1,296,615, nearly double what it was before the national banking system was established. I do not know whether these statistics are correct or not. They are the official statistics reported by the Comptroller of the Currency in his report.

While that was the case in the States I have mentioned, take the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and they have not the apportionment to which they were entitled under the law by $51,271,034. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska have not the apportionment they were entitled to by $21,423,811.

Mr. MORTON. I should like the Senator there to refer to the per capita circulation as between New England and the West and South.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am going to do that; but let me first continue my citation of statistics as to the apportionment.

Nevada, Oregon, California, Colorado, Utah, Idaho. Montana, Wyoming, New Mexico, Arizona, Dakota, and Washington Territory have not their portion of this banking capital by $7,926,648. They may not have demanded it, but some of these States, I suppose, have. California and Nevada do not need it, and probably did not want it, as they have always had a gold circulation; but that remark does not apply, I take it, to the other States and Territories; but it answers my purpose to show that banking capital, which ought to have been distributed all over the country to answer the purposes of exchanges, has been concentrated in the New England States and in New York and Pennsylvania.

The answer suggested by gentlemen to that is, that money goes where there is something to buy, where exchanges are to be effected, whether banks are there or not. But, sir, that answer is not sufficient, when we consider the condition of the South, where half the cotton crop of last year is not yet removed, and when we witness the state of the country in the West at this moment. That answer does not comport with the facts of the case.

Then there is another reason, and a very powerful reason, why there is a concentration of capital in New York and the New England States at this time. We have lately had a tremendous panic. I think it was groundless; but a panic is as bad without ground as with it; it has the same effect upon the country. New York and the New England States are the creditor States; the people who live there are the creditors in great measure of the rest of the nation. What has been the effect? All the money they could get has been drawn into the banks there. The banks wanted to make good their reserve, and make themselves strong, and every creditor there that could collect his debt in the West and South has collected it. It is a great mistake to say that the panic has disappeared. The panic is there to-day. A man from the South may go to New York to get money; there is plenty of money there and he can get it at a reasonable rate of interest; but what must he do to get it? He must furnish collaterals as security that are equal to the money itself. If he undertakes to get credit on personal security, he cannot get money at all. And the same remark applies to the western people; they are panic-stricken. The panic is not over in New York; the panic is not over in New England; the panic is not over anywhere. It is true the issue of the forty-four millions, or so much of it as has been issued, has tended to loosen matters, and lately business is in a little better condition, but the difficulty is being removed very slowly; and by reason of the fear that exists in New York, and all the business centers of the Eastern States, they are unwilling to lend money to the people of the West and South, and they will not do it until a long time shall elapse, unless Congress shall do something to reassure the public and put business on its feet again; and it is our duty now to do this, and as quickly as possible.

Why, sir, suppose the circulation were increased, what would be the effect? These people would see that the West and South were going to have greenbacks anyhow, and they would say "We might as well lend our money," and enterprise would begin again; the cotton would be shipped, and it would bear a better price in this depreciated currency; wheat would bear a better price, and there would be a larger sale, and business would move on, and then the money hoarded through fear of the panic would go out to the country—the revival of business would restore general confidence.

But then, it is said, we shall have a redundancy of currency. Suppose I admit, for the sake of argument, (which I do not believe,) that there will be a redundancy, it is very easy to retire it. The country will ascertain if there is a redundancy very soon, and it will then be very easy to retire it. But I apprehend that if more currency could be had the mills which have been closed all over New England and else where would be started agoing again. The men who are starving for bread and who are marching through the streets of the cities, threatening fire and destruction to them, would then find employment, and the country would be relieved. It would be only a temporary relief, and it would be a present advantage gained; and this is what is needed.

But, as I said, there is not a sufficient volume, even if the money were not locked up. For the causes I have mentioned the volume of currency is not sufficient. Why, sir, I do not think things have been overdone in New York and in the New England States; I mean the regular, legitimate business; and I do not embrace in this those adventurous speculations that probably helped to bring the late panic upon the country. I say that the manufacturers and artisan-employing people in New England and the States where money is centrated to-day have not overdone business. I know business has not been overdone in the South. I am informed by gentlemen who know better than I do that it has not been overdone in the West.

Let us see now how the circulation in the South compares with what it was before the war. Our exchanges are as great there now as they were before the war. The cotton crop is as much as then. The rice crop and sugar crop are not as great, but the tobacco crop is greater. There are more exchanges in the South to-day than there were before the war; and more money is required in the South to effect exchanges than at any time before in the history of the South. I apprehend the same remark will apply to the West. Now let us see what circulation they have there.

In 1860 my own State had a banking capital of $5,218,598. In 1873 it had a banking capital of $1,819,300. Is it not manifest that that is not sufficient? Can any one doubt that my State has not sufficient currency to effect the exchanges, which are quite as great as they were before the war? It may be said that the money should go there. But the money will not go there. The money has not gone there, though the cotton is there. There is a great state of distress in North Carolina at this moment. Half the cotton crop has not been moved, and they cannot get the currency to do it with. More than that, there is a state of distress growing out of this. The people of the South were in a great measure broken up and impoverished by the war. They have had to work since as they never did before. They have gone largely into the culture of cotton; and in order to get money in the spring season to plant their crops and mature them, they have had to borrow money and then mortgage the crop to secure the repayment. When the crops matured those mortgages had to be foreclosed, unless they should be discharged by payment of the debt. When the harvest came the people had not the money to pay these mortgage debts. What was the result? Immediately they began to negotiate for an extension of time for payment. They did not want to sacrifice their cotton. Many men, however, have sacrificed their cotton at the expense of being broken up and ruined pecuniarily. Others are still holding their cotton, hoping that Congress is going to send some relief. That is not only so in my own State, but I have learned that it is so in the States of South Carolina and Georgia, and I might say it is so in all the Southern States. The money that they borrowed under the stress of circumstances in the present abnormal condition of things they paid in many instances from 1½ to 2 per cent. a month for.

Then, again, before the war, South Carolina had $6,089,036 of banking circulation. It now has $2,319,500 of bank-currency circulation. Take Georgia. Georgia before the war had $8,311,728; now that great State has $2,365,605. Florida had $116,250 before the war; now it has $90,000. Alabama had $5,055,222 before the war; now it has $1,541,133. Louisiana, in 1863, had $8,876,519 of circulation; now it has $3,646,870.

I might go on and cite statistics in addition to what I have already cited, for the purpose of showing that the South, especially, is without the currency circulation that is necessary to effect the exchange. Why, sir, the great crop of this country, that which makes America rich, is made in the South. Our cotton crop this year will be worth $375,000,000, which if we had the coin for it, would take up almost the four hundred million greenbacks in circulation so much to the prejudice of the country, in view of a better currency.

Mr. MORTON. May I ask the Senator the circulation per capita of Mississippi?

Mr. MERRIMON. The circulation per capita of Mississippi is one cent. The per capita circulation in my State is $1.70.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to remind him that for five years the people in every one of these States had the same opportunity as the people in any other part of the United States to obtain banking circulation. I suppose the real reason was the want of capital.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will answer my friend. It is true that the South was impoverished by the war. It brought only evil to the whole land, and no one deplores it more than I do. I trust that we shall put it behind us, and go on in the march of nations and civilization. But to this day we feel there the impoverishment that was wrought by the war. The people did not have the capital, it is true, to organize many of these banks, but still the exchanges were there to be made; and why did not that concentrated capital in New York and New England go down there to make these exchanges?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sensible of the injustice of the distribution of banking circulation, and have done what I could to correct it; but what good would increased bank circulation do now in facilities to the Southern States when they are not prepared to comply with the law and furnish the requisite capital?

Mr. MERRIMON. My answer to that is that the bank capital is not now ready to be distributed if we had the money to pay for it. The capital is already invested in other banks now in existence.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken about that. For four or five years capital has been held in reserve. In Mississippi anybody who chooses to organize a bank can do it now.

Mr. MORTON. But the capital is all taken up. There are but $5,000 left.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is my understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. For five years it has been so.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to answer my friend in another way.

Mr. BOGY. Will my friend permit me a word?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. BOGY. There is no banking capital to be distributed now. The $54,000,000 authorized to be distributed by the supplemental act of 1870 have been located, if I may use that expression, in existing banks. Those banks, for some reason which I am not able to explain, have not been willing to increase their present capital, because they can make money enough with a small capital, but there is now no portion of the $54,000,000 which is not disposed of. The report of last year showed $7,000,000 yet in the Treasury, but it has been promised to existing banks. That is not taken out of the Treasury Department in the shape of national-bank notes, but a disposition has been made of it so that no new banks can be organized. Hence the notes of a broken bank to-day are worth in my country from 3 to 5 per cent. premium, and it is because no new national-bank notes can be obtained from the Treasury Department.

Mr. MORTON. According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, all the $54,000,000 have been issued or charters have been granted, and the currency applicable to new banks is less than the amount of $5,000, I believe.

Mr. SHERMAN. The banks in the Southern States have not yet called for this circulation, because they could not furnish the capital or purchase the bonds.

Mr. MERRIMON. Capital might perhaps be raised there now for that purpose; but I take the present condition of the matter, and I say that banking facilities cannot be obtained there. I know cases where there are private bankers who would like to have the advantage of the national-bank circulation, but they cannot get it.

But I want to make another argument at this point in order to show that the currency is not redundant. It is said that there is a redundancy in New York and in the Eastern States. I have adverted to the fact that they are the creditor class mainly. I have shown the effect of the panic and the demand for money there. I find that the people of New England want money to-day. Their manufactures languish; their enterprises all languish. But here is the point I wish to make: Capital, it was said the other day by some gentleman, will go where it is needed. These exchanges are to be made in the South; they are to be made in the West; and if there is a redundancy of capital in the East and they cannot use it there, why do capitalists not go to the South and West and use it there? They do not go there and use it because, as I infer, they have not more than they need at home. That is the reason of it. We know that our New England friends and the people of the Eastern States are enterprising beyond any other people in this country—I do not mean anything offensive by this—and if a dollar is to be made they know how to make it and where to make it, and if they had money that they could not employ profitably at home, it would be invested in the West and in the South, in banks or in other enterprises, and they would go there with their surplus money to effect the exchanges that are necessary to be made there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I again say that under the law as it now stands the Comptroller of the Currency ought, in my judgment, to give to the Southern and Western States $25,000,000 of bank circulation and withdraw it from the New England States. That is the law now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long would it stay there?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is another question. If the Senator from North Carolina desires another and more equal distribution of the banking circulation, I will most heartily join him; but I ask him whether now the right to issue more paper money would not tend to diminish the value of that which is on hand; and whether it is likely that any considerable portion of it would flow into the Southern States when of the seven hundred millions now outstanding so little has flowed there, as he says?

Mr. MERRIMON. I infer, and I think it is a reasonable inference, that the fact that it has not gone there is evidence of the fact that there is not too much of it where it is. And I am glad to make one more remark now in reply to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He asks if it were there now, how soon would it go back. Sir, it would go back very slowly if the banks of New England and New York did not pay interest so as to make it flow back when the people were not effectuating their exchanges in the South and West; and these banks pay such interest for it because they can lend it there and make another greater interest than they pay; that pays them. They find places and occasions for investments in the East, notwithstanding redundancy.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to say that the Comptroller of the Currency in his report sets out a state of facts showing that the provision of the act of 1870 for the transfer of twenty-five millions of bank circulation from the States in excess to the States in deficiency cannot be executed, and never will be.

Mr. BOGY. The Comptroller of the Currency reported a year or so ago that the fifty-four millions were disposed of to existing banks. And in reply to a suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont, how long would the money stay in the West and South, I would answer that question; and I have no doubt my friend from North Carolina can answer it a great deal better than I can. The South produces from two hundred and fifty to three hundred millions of production a year; and whenever a country produces a value—the product of labor—the money will remain there. When you locate money where there is no labor, no wealth, no value, the money will go to the great centers of trade unquestionably; but we in the West and South have got that which would keep the money at home, if we could get it there once.

Mr. MERRIMON. But there is another reason, Mr. President. The great volume of exchanges necessary to be made in the South and in the West is made at one season in the year; that is, when crops are ready to be sent to market; it is the season when the cotton and other crops are gathered. When crops are gathered, and they are put into the market, then exchanges are necessary to be made. There is a large portion of the year when a vast volume of currency is not needed there. The New England States and New York, needing more currency, finding a greater demand for money growing out of enterprises and adventures of one sort and another, offer to pay interest for money, and the people in the South and West, not wanting their money and not being able to lend it at home at the season when it is not needed, send it off to the East in order that they may get interest from the banks, and the result of that is panics and the distress that we have experienced.

Sir, I do not see how these facts are to be answered or explained away. It required the circulation that I have shown in order to effectuate the exchanges in the South before the war. Our exchanges are as great there to-day as they were before the war, and it seems to me that that fact is unanswerable. Money is not there to do it, and hence the distress prevails there which I have called to the attention of the Senate. All these circumstances go to show that the circulation is not too great, and is, indeed, insufficient to supply legitimate wants.

Mr. MORTON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion in the line of his argument?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to suggest one advantage—even if the currency is of the same volume—of having banks in all the States. If the banks of North Carolina have circulation and loan it out, it must return there to those banks in that State every sixty, ninety, or one hundred and twenty days; but if their people borrow money from New England, getting the same volume of currency, the money is carried back to the New England States constantly and drained from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. An argument has been made to show that our circulation is sufficient and, indeed, redundant, by comparing the circulation here with the circulation in England and France. There is a great misapprehension, it seems to me, in trying to draw an analogy between this country and either of those. Take England, for example. The country is densely populated. There exchanges are small and rapid in many cases. One dollar will pay $500 in a day, ten dollars will pay $1,000 in a day, $1,000 will pay $100,000 a day in London. It is not so in the greater portion of this country. In New York and some of the large commercial cities of the Union it is true a dollar might pay as much as it would in London; but it is not true in the South; it is not true in the great West. A dollar often pays but a dollar a day, and sometimes it lies idle for weeks. I call attention to this fact for the purpose of showing that the circumstances of our country are such as to require a greater volume to effect the exchanges, because there is a larger percentage of it that lies idle all the time; a large percentage of our currency is, in the way I have indicated, idle.

For these reasons I infer that the volume of currency ought to be increased. It ought to be increased in order to relieve the pending panic. At all events, for that purpose, one hundred millions of greenbacks ought to be put in circulation, to the end that the country may be relieved of the panic and that the industries of the country may be revived.

But then there is another thing which I had almost forgotten, and I want to advert to it again. By reason of this greenback system, this bloated currency, and the bloated volume of business, there is debt created all over the South and all over the West, and the principal portion of the debt is due to persons living in the Eastern States. When these debts were created what was the agreement? The agreement was that they should be solved by this bloated currency. Now it is proposed to contract the currency, whereby it becomes scarcer and is made more valuable—made to appreciate; and this requires the debtor class to pay their debts in a currency that is much more valuable than the currency in which they agreed to pay. That is unjust; that is iniquitous; and I trust that the Senate will not think of being a party to so gross a wrong as that. A debt was created, for example, last spring, when money was plenty, when circulation was free. A person agreed to pay $1,000 to another for a tract of land. Money has become scarce since by reason of the panic; it has appreciated 20 per cent.; he has to pay that debt of $1,000 now, and it takes $1,000 of greenbacks to pay it, and instead of paying $1,000 he pays $1,200, by reason of the appreciation of the currency. This is one example, but this single example illustrates the whole condition of things. I say that the policy of contraction, whereby greenbacks are appreciated but are not made to approximate by the hundredth part of a cent to gold, as I have had occasion to show, tends to compel the debtor class to pay the creditor class a larger amount than they stipulated to pay.

It may be asked why I put off the day of specie payments to the 4th of July, 1876. I do it for this reason: the business of the country is based on our bloated currency. If one person agrees to pay another $1,000 for a horse or anything else the understanding is that that contract is to be discharged in greenbacks—the present currency. And if we could return to specie payment to-morrow, and the specie were here to be put in circulation in lieu of the greenback currency, is it not manifest that if these debts were discharged in gold the debtor would pay the creditor 20 per cent. more than he agreed to pay him? That is manifest. I put off the day for a return to specie payments, therefore, to the end that the business people of this country, seeing the monetary system devised and established by Congress, may adjust the business of the country to that; so that when the law goes into operation the debtor class will owe debts that they are bound by the law by their agreement to discharge in gold or its equivalent. That will be just and fair. But this squeezing process by which it is proposed to go into specie payments suddenly, and to make no provision for the relief of the distressed condition of the country now, makes the debtor class pay 20 per cent. more—nay, more than that—in order to discharge their debts; and the effect of that is general ruin throughout the country. I want to put off the day of returning to specie payments until the business of the country shall have time and opportunity to adjust itself to the new system which is to go into operation on that day.

And now let me say a word about the pledge of the Government to return to specie payments.

I maintain that the pledge of the Government ought to have been redeemed before this. I think if a proper policy had been pursued by the Government we should have had specie payments before this time. But there is no good purpose served in talking about the past; that is gone. There is no good end to be subserved now by indulging in any complaints about it. There is no benefit in repining about it. It is the duty of Congress to make the same provision at this session that it ought to have done immediately after the war. And what is our duty? The act of March 18, 1869, provided that we should return to specie payments as soon as practicable. What does that mean? That phrase has a technical or legal meaning. A proper construction of it is that as soon as reasonably, in view of the circumstances of the country, the business of the country, putting war behind, Congress could provide ways and means to return to specie payments, it should be done. In my judgment the time to do it is that which I have indicated; the course that we should pursue in view of the circumstances of the country, redeeming this pledge as far as we can do at this late hour, is to return to specie payments on the 4th of July, 1876, and to require the banks to resume specie payments two months after that time, and to have gold with which to pay every dollar of their currency, dollar for dollar.

What, then, is the conclusion?

First, that the only standard of exchange, and that which we must have in order to put ourselves upon a plane with the nations of the earth and enjoy all the benefits of commerce, is to return to specie payments as speedily as possible.

Secondly, to return to specie payments on the 4th day of July, 1876; and this can be effected by allowing gold to accumulate in the Treasury—that portion of it that is not necessary to pay the public debt from this day to then—and to sell 5 per cent. bonds of the Government in sufficient amount to raise a sum sufficient to pay off all the greenbacks on that day.

Thirdly, to provide for the relief of the country between now and that time by increasing the volume of the greenback currency; and I say "the greenback currency," because that is better than the bank currency. There is a difference of from one to one and a half per cent. between the two currencies.

Here I might stop, Mr. President, for I have detained the Senate much longer than I anticipated; but I wish to say now that I am opposed to this national banking system. I think we ought to devise a different system.

In the first place, it creates a vast monopoly. Whoever get the capital first have the right to arrange the shares of stock as they will, and a few men may hold the whole of it. I maintain that that is wrong, and that it creates monopoly.

I have another objection to it. It is founded purely upon credit. It is essentially a credit currency, and therefore, good as the credit is, it is 20 per cent. less valuable than gold. In the next place, every dollar of its capital stock is in the Treasury of the United States. They receive from 5 to 6 per cent. on the bonds deposited there, and they receive from the Government 90 per cent. in currency upon which they bank. What is the result of this system of banking? The result has been that those who own this stock in sufficient quantity have grown immensely rich; they have realized dividends annually that exceed 10 per cent. per annum, and many times the dividends have reached 20 per cent., and the accumulation of the surplus fund amounts to the enormous sum of over $120,000,000 in the country. They have loaned their money, as any one must see, at from 1 to 1½ per cent. a month. I put it to the Senate, I put it to the country, to say if industry can prosper while the people pay that rate of interest for money. It never occurred before in the world, it cannot be true now, and I maintain that it is the duty of Congress to afford redress to the people on account of such evils and wrongs.

Then, sir, I have another objection, and that is this: I maintain that the volume of currency ought not to be fixed by law. It ought not to be fixed by a statute, and it ought not to be controlled by politicians and statesmen. The volume of currency that is necessary is a sufficient amount to effectuate the exchanges of the country. Money is only necessary for the purpose of effectuating that purpose. As I have already said, if there is more than is necessary for that purpose, it is redundant, and it will be redundant, whether it be gold or greenbacks, or any other sort of currency. I say, therefore, that Congress ought not to undertake to regulate by an act the volume of currency; that it ought to be fixed by the wants of the country; and that the business men, the financial men, the merchants, the manufacturers, the industrial men of the country, ought to determine the volume of exchange, and let the exchanges determine what it shall be.

Then, further, sir, whenever the banking system of the country is connected with the Government, as the present banking system is, it is more or less affected by the political party that administers the Government. I do not mean here to complain of the party that is now administering the Government; for no matter what party might administer the Government, it would tamper more or less with the banking system if allied with the Government as it now is. It is the business of the Government to grant charters to the merchants, and business men, and capitalists, and to establish banks to suit the interests of commerce; and it is the business of commercial men to administer the affairs of the banks. The banks ought to belong to the business people, and not to the Government.

I must say candidly that I do not favor returning to the old system of allowing the States to provide banks. Money is intended for the purposes of exchange and commerce, and the national Government regulates, so far as it can be regulated by statute, the commerce of the country and the exchanges. I therefore would be willing to see Congress grant a charter for a great national bank, letting the shares be twenty-five dollars each, so that the people of the country of small means could own stock in it. The bank suggested ought to be allowed to have a capital stock of $1,000,000,000. It ought to be managed by a board of directors and have as many branches in the several States as the wants of the people might require. If that were so, the monetary interest of the country would have a powerful conservative effect upon the country. In times of peace enterprise and industry would prosper; and it would operate as a check upon the Government and politicians when disposed unreasonably to precipitate the country into unnecessary wars. In time of war such a bank would come to the relief of the country and prove of the most essential benefit.

There is another objection to this banking system; and that is, as I have already shown, that it is unequally distributed. That ought not to be tolerated. And I wish to make this general remark here: If this country is to be preserved, if it is worth preserving, if we desire to see it perpetuated and established upon enduring foundations, we must change the industrial and capital interests of the country so as to distribute them over the country in such way as to produce an equilibrium of interests. We must nationalize the sentiment of the country by producing mutuality of interests in this way. We must produce an equilibrium in the interests of all sections. Our national policy ought to be to extend manufactures to the West and South, so that the great capital interests will not be concentrated in one section. Sectional strife and sectional interests have already come near dissolving the Government and destroying its life; and they will do it or attempt it again unless Congress shall pursue such legislation and adopt such a policy as will tend to produce an equilibrium in all industrial, commercial, and monetary interests throughout the land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the honorable Senator a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does he believe it to be within the competence of Congress under any of the provisions of the Constitution to produce such an equilibrium of industries, to declare that there shall be so many shoemakers in the South, and so many cotton factories, or to otherwise provide for those things which are regulated by the private interests of men?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not; but, sir, that does not answer my argument. I said that Congress ought to pursue such a policy and adopt such legislation as would result in that end.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How?

Mr. MERRIMON. You ought to improve the rivers and harbors of the South and West; you ought to extend, by the legislation of Congress, such advantages as will take capital and immigration to the South and the West; you ought to cut canals; you ought to levee the banks of the Mississippi, and encourage ship-building. There are a thousand things that Congress could do, and a national policy of Congress could be developed by which these interests will be distributed with some degree of equality all over the country from one end to the other. Until that is done you cannot have the cordial national sentiment that ought to prevail in this country. We want to nationalize public sentiment; I am sure I sincerely desire to do so; but you cannot do it while you have sectional interests. Sir, that vast accumulation of capital and population in the Eastern States must in the end go to the South and West; and, so far as Congress can do it, Congress ought to inaugurate a policy that will lead to that result.

If the legislation of Congress had been in that direction, all the currency would not have been concentrated where it is. Those people in New England would be spread all over the West and all over the South, where there is a soil to be developed, rich mines to be worked, everything to invite industry and capital. But, sir, while we go on with sectional legislation, while California has one interest, and New England another interest, and the Southern States another interest, they will grow up to be powerful and jealous rivals, and when they come in conflict you may expect the clash of arms in the end. These sectional interests brought on conflict once, and will bring it again unless we pursue a nationalizing policy.

But, Mr. President, this is a digression. I simply intended to mention the fact that I oppose the present national banking system. I have alveady occupied too much of the time of the Senate, and will not detain it with further views on this subject now. At another time I may put my objections in a more definite shape. I thank the Senate for the indulgence extended to me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this debate, although I do wish that I could have better understood the honorable Senator from North Carolina in the means that he proposes for keeping the money in any particular part of the country, where the people who have it owe it to somebody else who happens to live in another part of the country. If all men are honest, I suppose the money of the country will be in the pockets of those to whom it really belongs after every man has paid his debts, and that, therefore, the natural tendency of money is into the pockets of those who are entitled to have it; that is to say, those who, or whose grandfathers, have earned it beforehand and have lent it out upon some security or other. I do not know, therefore, any barrier of State lines or any contrivance of Congress by having a million of banks in the Southern States which will keep currency there, unless the body of the people there are in such circumstances, each for himself, as entitles him, after he has paid his debts, to have in his pocket a thousand or a hundred thousand dollars. When you reach that point, anybody who is rich in the South has money enough, even if he keeps it on deposit in the city of New York; and you cannot control by Congress the place where he shall keep his deposits, unless you invade the fourteenth amendment, which declares that citizens' rights shall be sacred; and nobody would wish to do that as applied to such a case. Every citizen has a right to keep his money where he thinks he can make the most by it. Some invest it in foreign enterprises; some in manufactures in States far distant from the places of their residence; some in banks far distant from the places of their residence; some in merchandise; some in real estate.

Neither Congress nor any other power can interfere with this private right of the people; and therefore when you have passed that you come back to the single original proposition, and that is, that the money of the country in its flowing is always flowing to the point where ultimately it has the right to rest in the possession of the man who is entitled to it and whose debts are paid. I am sure my friend from North Carolina will not deny that, because I think it to be founded upon the simplest principles of political and social economy.

If that be so, then the granting of $50,000,000 of banking capital to the South, taking it from the East, (to which I do not object at all if there is anybody to take it down there,) will not keep currency in the South or in the West, unless the pre-existing state of things which I have named is found there. As long as the West owes the East, as the expression is, so long, if the West is honest—as it is—the money in the West received by the farmers for their grain or by the steamboatmen for their transportation, will flow out of their pockets toward the pockets of those who are finally entitled, as creditors and owners of the money, to have it.

To bring the illustration home, I do not believe there is a dollar more in the State of Vermont now than there would be if all the banking capital of New England were removed to the State of Louisiana; for every man in Vermont who is entitled to have any money, because he has earned it and had it, would have it then just the same as he has it now, unless he chooses to invest it in southern enterprises, as many gentlemen do; and I am glad that they do, because it tends to assist the development of the country that money should be used in it; but you cannot make it stay there unless the people who are the proprietors of the money choose of their own free will, and without any law, to keep their money in a place where it does not naturally and necessarily belong.

It seems clear to me, therefore, that no amount of contrivance and legislation can force circulation to remain in the West or the South—and that is what the people want, the cash—for any permanent length of time, until the West and the South, by industry and economy, which have been the means which have enabled the East to possess some little money, shall be enabled themselves to be the proprietors of the money that they receive for the industry that they perform. So long as they are debtors, of course honor and interest and social economy compel them to pay it out immediately when they receive the money to somebody else, and at last it comes to its resting place, in the pocket of the owner.

As was said, I believe, by a Senator about another subject entirely, there is an absolutely "irrepressible conflict," therefore, between the people who wish to borrow and use other men's money and the people who have the money themselves; and that conflict always is determined, and in spite of laws or constitutions it always will be determined, until society breaks up entirely, in favor of the party who in justice and honesty is entitled to the ownership of the cash in question. New England cannot keep money that she owes to the West. She must send it where it belongs; she must perform her obligations. New England, and the East, and New York, and Pennsylvania cannot keep money that they owe to the South. It must be sent there to discharge their obligations. So, on the other hand, if money that exists in the South is due in New York, or in the East anywhere, it must go there. If it goes there for any other cause, it goes because the private holder of that money, in the exercise of his rights of citizenship, chooses to invest it in the East, rather than in the West or in the South.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that these simple propositions are beyond cavil, and that they are, like "the higher law" that we all believe in as applied to some cases, above and beyond all legislation. You cannot reverse the principles of nature; you cannot reverse the principles of moral government; and therefore, as long as you submit to the idea (as we all do, I hope, with pleasure) that one of the highest duties of man is to pay his debts and to discharge his obligations, you have then put the money into the hands of the person who is the ultimate owner of it, and you are then forced upon the same principle to allow that owner of it to dispose of it according to his free will. He may invest it in western lands or in western railways; and I am glad to see him do so. He may invest it in southern cotton or in southern manufactures, and I should be glad to see him do it; but you cannot by an act of Congress force him one step either backward or forward in the disposition of his own. To provide, therefore, by law any policy which shall compel the circulating medium of the country which answers in place of money, or the money itself, to remain in one section of country rather than another, is to propose, in my opinion, an impossibility.

But I did not rise, Mr. President, to make a speech upon this topic at all; I only rose to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator's argument goes upon the ground that the commercial and industrial interests of this country are in a normal condition, whereas the reverse of that is true. There are special circumstances that have forced the money from the West and from the South to New York and the great monetary centers in the East. The great productions that go to New York go there from the South and from the West. Then the money ought to go out from there to the West and South to pay for them. What is there to take it back to New York, according to the natural course of things? The South produces $350,000,000 worth of cotton annually. The great bulk of that goes to New York. The money ought to go down South to pay for it. What, in the natural course of things, ought to take that money back to New York? There is something outside of the natural channel of things that takes it back there. So that I say the Senator's argument proceeds upon a false basis—meaning no disrespect by the term "false."

But, again, the honorable Senator knows that we have a rich soil in the South; that we have a climate that surpasses any in the world; that we have vast water-power; that we have means of navigation unsurpassed; that we have railroad systems. If we had the money, if we had the capital there, we would build up towns and cities; we would build new railroads and open mines. Then, sir, the creditor would not be in New England; the creditor would be at home. If a like policy was pursued toward the West the same state of things would result there; and Wall street, instead of being in New York, would be in Charleston, Savannah, or New Orleans. I say, then, again, that the argument of the honorable Senator proceeds upon a false basis. The condition of our industrial affairs is not in a normal state.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I must be permitted to say one word in reply to my honorable friend. He says that the South has a rich soil, and rich mines, and a capacity for great development; and that it needs capital to develop it. How is the South to get that capital? If the people of the South now have the capital they can apply it to that purpose.

Mr. MERRIMON. We want your people to come there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If they have it not, they must earn it or invite other capital. My honorable friend says he wishes my people to go there. I say amen; but how are they to go there? Are they to go to a land of peace and equal rights? Are they to find the same state of society that they find in New England, where to labor with the hand is not dishonorable? Are they to find equal justice in the courts and the calm and regular administration of law and order? I do not say they are not. I only say that when the Southern States show to the people of what you may call, if you please, the overcrowded East and the overcapitalized East, that capital may be safely invested under the protection of law, and that labor shall be honored and respected, and that calm and deliberate justice which fears no man and favors no man shall be administered in every one of those States, and that life and property shall be safe, as they are in New England, then the soil of the South will be cultivated; then its mines will be developed; then its water-falls will resound with the sound of the spindles of the manufactory and with the blows upon the anvil; but until then my honorable friend cannot expect that capital, which is sensitive, and that eastern people, who have been taught not to be overdesirous of danger, will deposit their hard earnings on such uncertain securities.

This may be a prejudice on the part of the East, but it does exist. I hope it is a prejudice. But let us all labor together in a way that we can labor under the Constitution to promote equal justice everywhere, and peace and order everywhere; and then, capital, invited to fresh and fair fields, will go there, and the South and the West, and every part of the country, will be developed by a capital that will be eagerly invested where there is a hope that a fair reward may be obtained.

But, as I have said, Mr. President——

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg the gentleman to allow me to say one word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do hope that we shall cease to hear that a man's life is not safe at the South. The war is over; it is ended. We had conflicts, which I deplore as much as anybody. Those conflicts, I trust, are in the past; and I beg to say to the honorable Senator that his life, anybody's life, whether he comes from New England, from California, or from any portion of the habitable globe, is just as safe in my State, and I venture to say anywhere in the South, and his property also, as it is in Vermont, or Massachusetts, or any other State in New England. You may take up the statistics of crime, putting aside all the evils growing out of the war, and which happened during the war, and the ratio of crime, the ratio of outrage, the ratio of riots, is in favor of the South two to one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will not prolong this discussion, but I will only state one fact that I have had communicated to me since this discussion began, on this very topic, of how people from the East and the North who invest their capital and their fortunes and go themselves to the South to carry on business are treated. I am told, upon good authority, that in the city of New Berne, I believe in my honorable friend's own State, a New England man of highly respectable character, who had committed no crime against the laws of his own or any other State, who was educated, cultivated, polite, well dressed, opened a mercantile establishment. Everybody was glad to trade with him, but not a single gentleman in New Berne ever invited him into his house or called upon him or his wife; and for the sole reason, as far as that man could understand, as no taint attached to his character, that he was a Yankee, and was engaged in the debasing and ungentlemanly business of trading.

Now, Mr. President, so long as there may exist in the South this prejudice against what I said before was the honorable character of labor and of attending to one's own affairs, just so long the South must remain poor, and just so long New England men, who have been taught to believe in the honesty of honest labor, and in the honor and dignity of it, and that no social distinctions could rest upon the honest employments of men, will refuse to go there, and just so long you will find that labor and capital, which ought to flow, I admit, into those beautiful regions of the South, will not go there.

I do not say this as a reproach to North Carolina, nor by any means as a reproach to my friend; but I do say, until the manners and habits of New England are carried South, by which I mean the social equality of people in equal station—I do not mean the social equality that has been discussed in other places, although I might enlarge upon that, but leaving that aside entirely—until it becomes respectable for a man from New England to engage in mercantile business in North Carolina, and until he and his family are received there, as they would be received in Wisconsin or Illinois, with kindliness and hospitality, just so long you may expect that the South will wilt and wither and cry for money which she cannot get.

Now, Mr. President, I must put an end to this discussion, and I therefore move——

Mr. MERRIMON. Let me say one word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you will make it very short, I will give my friend the last word.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will be very short. I do not feel like going into a discussion now. I desire to say that in the case the Senator speaks of there was something connected with the man that denied him admittance into the society that he sought to enter. If a northern gentleman from Vermont or any New England State goes South he is received and treated as a gentleman. No longer ago than the other day the Treasurer of the United States stopped at Charlotte; it was during the night; and the military school and the people of that town turned out and serenaded him and compelled him to make a speech. He was received there with great cordiality, and staid two or three days, as I understand. I know from my own personal observation, I know from my own practice, that these statements which have been whispered into my honorable friend's ear are not true. When a man seeks society, he finds it in the South just as I would find it, I have no doubt, in New England, if he is worthy to go there; and if he is not fit to go there, he ought not to go.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President——

Several SENATORS. Make your motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am going to make my motion; but before doing so I must say one word. This is an interesting topic to me, because I am getting enlightened about the state of affairs in the South. My friend says there must be some mistake about the case to which I referred. Perhaps there is. I do not know it if there be; but I should be glad to know if it has not been true until very recently, if it is not now, that, as a rule, no officer of the United States Army, sent to a particular post or station in the South with his family, has would be received into society there? I know that since the war been over I have visited the honorable State of North Carolina, and I have found from the statements of the officers of the posts themselves that they were not received into society, except that of those whom a controlling majority of the southern people called "scalawags."

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend let me deny that statement? I deny it for North Carolina; I deny it for myself. I know the contrary to exist. I know there are officers of the Army occupying as high social position in North Carolina as anywhere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. MERRIMON. And I know that the gentlemen of my own city often go out to dine or to sup with the officers at the station.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad to hear it, because the times have improved since 1867, when I was down there myself, and when, on all occasions when officers of the Army were showing hospitality to me, they stated, as an excuse that I did not meet with southern gentlemen who had held opposite views, that they had never called upon them and their families. It may be that these officers were telling me a falsehood; but I have a high respect for officers of the Army of the United States. I know that they are not accustomed to tell falsehoods. Their training has been quite the reverse. They have been taught to tell the truth, as well as to work out the truth under the Constitution by their own good swords. So, Mr. President, I am glad to know now—and I speak in all seriousness—that times are improving in the South; and I say just as fast as they do thus improve, just as fast as we do have national equality and a national social system, so fast the South will improve, and no faster.

Now, sir, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fourteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 21, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. DONNAN. I rise to submit a privileged report. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution with reference to inquiring into the expediency of furnishing one copy daily of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the cases of the compositors of said RECORD, have directed me to report the same adversely.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of furnishing one copy daily of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the cases of the compositors of said RECORD.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and the same was laid on the table.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DONNAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the following resolution of the House, with the recommendation that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on War Claims and the commissioners of claims one thousand copies of the last report of the commissioners of claims in addition to the number already ordered.

Mr. DONNAN. I will say that this is for the use of the Committee on War Claims, and the Public Printer estimates that the entire cost will be only $22.59.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has there been any extra number printed as yet?

Mr. DONNAN. None whatever.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will hear me for one moment, I think he will withdraw the call for the regular order at present. This is a bill in reference to the territorial courts, which it is of importance should be passed immediately.

Mr. ELDREDGE. This is a very important matter, and I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will not prevent its consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the call for the regular order at present.

JUDGES IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1393) providing for the assignment of judges in the Territories; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the Legislature of each of the organized Territories of the United States, except the Territory of Utah, shall at each regular session thereof make an assignment of the judges to hold the courts in the several districts in such Territory; provided that if the Legislature of either of such Territories shall have failed or shall hereafter fail to make such assignment, the judges of such Territory shall make an assignment, which shall continue in force until the next regular session of the Legislature.

Mr. POLAND. I desire, Mr. Speaker, just one moment to make an explanation. The law provides that the Legislature of each of the Territories, except the Territory of Utah, shall make an assignment of the judges. In the Territories of Dakota and Wyoming the Legislatures at their recent sessions failed to make any assignments of the judges; and the judges thinking they have no authority to hold courts in their respective districts, unless there be an assignment by law, bills were introduced for each of those Territories. The committee have deemed it more advisable to report a general bill that shall apply in all cases of this kind, and in lieu of the two special bills that were referred to the committee they report this general bill, allowing the judges to make an assignment for themselves during the vacation of the Legislature if the Legislature fails to do so.

Mr. CROUNSE. I desire to offer an amendment to strike out the exception in the case of the Territory of Utah. I see no reason why that Territory should be excepted.

Mr. POLAND. I will explain to the gentleman that the committee have made no change in that respect. The law now is in the Territory of Utah that the governor assigns the judges. The law in all the other Territories provides that the Legislatures shall assign the judges. We have made no change in the law, except to provide that where the Legislature does not make the assignment the judges may assign themselves until the next meeting of the Legislature.

Mr. CROUNSE. Having heard that explanation, I shall not offer my amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CURRENCY.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the expediency—

First. Of authorizing the national banks to increase their circulation from ninety to one hundred cents on each dollar of bonds held as security for their present circulation.

Secondly. Of providing that all banks issuing circulation be limited in the amount of their discounts to twice their capital stock, so as to compel the conversion of all their unnecessary surplus into capital and remove the inducement to pay interest on deposits, while securing their depositors against the danger of undue speculation.

Thirdly. Of devising such legislation as shall give the nation a circulating medium equal in valuation to coin, current everywhere in the world, and available at home in amounts measured by the actual business of the country, the only sound basis of a legitimate circulation.

Fourthly. Of devising such legislation as shall ally the money and credit of Government with the capital and business of the country, thereby removing the antagonism between the same now existing, increasing the amount of money available for loans, reducing the rates of interest, and providing a stable and elastic currency bottomed upon the wants of actual business.

Fifthly. Of releasing the national banks from holding, thereby utilizing for loans, their present reserves.

Sixthly. Also to inquire into the best means of substituting so much of the currency as represents a credit given by the people to Government, in form of the legal-tender notes, with a currency lent to the people by the issues, thereby so changing its quality as to protect the country from the evils of an inflated circulation.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I merely request to have the resolution printed and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. We do not need any instruction on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for the establishment of an exchequer, for reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. CHAFFEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish this House with a copy of the report or reports made by the Commissioners on the part of the United States appointed under the provisions of the Pacific Railroad act.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. PACKARD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to certain private land claims in Louisiana; which was recommitted to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STORM. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the morning hour begins at eighteen minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports from committees are in order, beginning with the Joint Committee on Printing.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration to report a joint resolution relating to the centennial exhibition.

The joint resolution was read. The preamble to the resolution states that at the several international exhibitions which have been held in foreign countries the United States have been represented in pursuance of invitations given by the governments of those countries and accepted by our Government. The resolution proposes (the Senate concurring) to request the President to extend in the name of the United States a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented, and to take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876.

Mr. KELLEY. I have been reminded of what did not occur to me or any member of the committee, that in view of the action of the last Congress this should be in the form of a bill instead of a resolution. I therefore ask that it be changed accordingly by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will make the necessary change.

The bill (H. R. No. 1394) was received, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KELLEY. The sole object of this bill is to perfect the language of existing law. It was believed that the action of Congress in providing that the national commission should prepare rules and regulations for the government of the centennial exposition, and that the President should transmit those rules and regulations to foreign countries, was equivalent to instructing him to extend an invitation. But the State Department hesitates about giving a formal invitation, and this bill is to remove that difficulty. It simply requires the Government to invite other governments to have their peoples participate in the exposition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If this bill passes and the President issues an invitation, will not that require Congress to see to it that money enough is appropriated to carry this matter through?

Mr. KELLEY. That question is by no means involved in this bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman a moment.

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I trust that everybody will understand the scope and intent of this bill. As I understand, there is difficulty now exactly in the line of the question just put by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and that is to get the President and Secretary of State to commit the Government to this enterprise, thereby furnishing an additional argument to the projectors of this great Fourth of July celebration, when the question comes up which we must pass upon, that is, the appropriation of Government money. As I understand it, the whole force of this bill now brought in is, that instructing the President and Secretary of State to invite other nations to take part in this exposition shall be afterward used as an argument that we as a nation are committed to it. That, I presume, is all there is in it. And being committed to it as a nation, we must as a government pay the bills. I can see looming up out of this, and as a result of this persistent movement for the Philadelphia centennial and of this little bill brought in here, appropriations called for within the next four years ranging from five to ten million dollars.

I do not propose to discuss this matter here, for I have not time; and I presume the gentleman introducing this bill does not propose much discussion. I only wish to let the House understand that in voting for this bill we cripple ourselves and furnish an argument for this great projected operation in its widest extent and reach.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman misapprehends alike the purpose and scope of the bill before the House. There is already a misunderstanding between our Government and foreign governments upon the question of an invitation. The United States commissioners, who by nomination of the governors of the several States and Territories and the appointment of the President of the United States have charge of this "little Philadelphia Fourth of July celebration," acting in pursuance of the law of Congress, have sent to foreign governments through the United States Government the rules and regulations by which the centennial exhibition is to be governed, and invited the people of all nations through the several governments of the world to participate in this exhibition. The United States Government transmitted that invitation of this United States commission, and transmitted it in such cordial terms that Prince Bismarck brought it to the attention of his government and formally accepted the invitation of the United States. Other governments have understood it to be an invitation from the Government, and accepted it as such. They understand that in transmitting the invitation of the United States commission, a creation of its own, the Government invited them to induce their people to visit our country and exhibit their best productions.

Our own Government, not finding the word "invitation" in the law, have not in fact extended a formal invitation, and have disclaimed their right to do so. Now, sir, every national exhibition that has been held has been held under the auspices of the government of the country in which it was held, and that government has, through the Government of the United States, invited our people to participate in the exhibition. This bill can lead to no expenditure of money by the Government or by the centennial commission, for we paid the expenses of our commission to London, to Paris, to Vienna; and so did every other nation. And every nation will bear the expense of the commission which shall superintend the exhibition of its arts, industries, and natural products.

The Secretary of State explains the whole matter in a letter to the director-general of the exhibition, from which I will take the liberty to read a few paragraphs:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, November 14, 1873.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, in which you recall the attention of this Department to the suggestion contained in your letter of the 20th ultimo, that a general instruction might be addressed to the ministers of the United States abroad, and in countries where we have no diplomatic agents to the proper consular officers, directing them to urge upon the governments to which they are accredited the early appointment of commissioners, or agents, if not already appointed, to enter into correspondence with the commission, and that information be sought through the same channels as to the approximate estimate of space in the industrial and fine-art departments of the exhibition which each government will probably require.

In reply I have to state that while the President feels a deep and sincere interest in the success of the exhibition, and Congress has given to it the sanction of its approval of its object and design, he has not been authorized by Congress to extend any invitation on behalf of the Government to foreign powers to participate in the exhibition. He was only authorized, by the act of March 3, 1871, to issue a proclamation setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open, and the place at which it will be held, and to communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners for publication in their respective countries. The President issued his proclamation on the 3d of July last, and copies of it and of the regulations referred to were communicated to the representatives of foreign powers accredited to this Government, with a note commending the exhibition to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein. Copies of these were also forwarded to the diplomatic representatives of this Government abroad.

Neither the act creating the commission, nor that incorporating the board of finance, authorizes any invitation in the name or on behalf of the Government to be extended to foreign powers, but only the announcement which was directed to be given, and has been given, to the representatives of those powers at this capital.

Should it be the desire of the commission to have another instruction prepared and forwarded to the diplomatic and consular officers of this Government, requesting them to use, unofficially, their good offices with a view to inducing foreign governments to participate in the exhibition, the Department will cause such instruction to be issued.

I take this opportunity to again assure the commission that both the President and this Department feel a lively interest in the success of the proposed celebration and exhibition to be held in commemoration of the anniversary of American Independence, and will extend all the aid to the commission which properly can be extended toward enlisting the sympathy and co-operation of foreign powers, for the fulfillment of that object.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

A. T. GOSHORN, Esq., &c., Philadelphia.

Mr. Speaker, other nations require the sanction of our Government to this grand national enterprise; they will not act without it; the precedent is established that they cannot act except upon invitation from our national Government. Therefore, if we palter about this word, we exclude from our international exhibition citizens of other countries, except an adventurous few who may come irrespective of the sanction, influence, and protection of their government.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. KELLEY. A word, but not a speech.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say that I propose to utter that "word" as a sincere friend of this enterprise, and with an earnest desire for its success. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to one point which, if any, will prevent the bill from passing this House. Attention was called to it by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] Those of us who have examined the question, as I have done so far as I have had an opportunity, find that there is a concerted effort to enlist the aid of the Government for the success of this enterprise to the amount of about $5,000,000. This invitation, which I deem it is necessary at some time should be extended to foreign governments, appears to be designed to commit (I believe that is the proper word) the Government of the United States to the proposition to make it a national enterprise, and, to that extent, to imply the guarantee of the Government. Now, if it will meet the gentleman's purpose at this time to admit a few words in the way of a proviso, which I ask may be read for information, it will relieve many of us at least of the difficulty we shall otherwise have in sustaining the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I will respectfully say to the gentleman that I am not authorized, by the committee who instructed me to report this bill, to accept or permit any amendment.

Mr. KASSON. Will you allow me to read the amendment simply for information?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. My amendment is in this form:

Provided, That in communicating such invitation to foreign governments it shall be done in such language as not to present it as an enterprise guaranteed by the Government of the United States.

This will obviate the difficulty we have in sustaining this proposition. We do not want to commit the House in advance to this enterprise.

Mr. KELLEY. Unless I should hear some dissent from the members of the Committee on the Centennial Celebration I will not object to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object.

Mr. KELLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] manifested his earnest friendship for this enterprise when he told us that its managers are likely to apply to the Government for more money than it will cost altogether, although Pennsylvania and her citizens have already contributed $3,500,000 to the fund.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who says he has examined this matter and is a friend to the enterprise, bears me out in my statement.

Mr. KASSON. I did not state the amount so largely as the gentleman.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman stated $5,000,000. I stated it would be from five to ten million dollars. The gentleman's figures certainly bear out my conjecture.

Mr. KELLEY. I will say to the gentleman that the members of my committee object to admitting that amendment, or any other, and therefore I cannot do it.

Mr. DEWITT. Will the gentleman allow me to have an amendment read?

Mr. KELLEY. As I cannot admit it I do not see the utility of allowing it to be read. I will, however, yield to the gentleman in due time.

Mr. DE WITT. Will the gentleman allow me to read the amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. Will gentlemen allow me to state my case before I am asked to yield the floor to others? When I shall have finished my statement, I will, so far as my time will admit, permit other gentlemen to be heard.

I desire to say that the sum of $8,000,000, it is believed, will cover all the expenses involved in the construction of the exhibition buildings; and as the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] the chairman of the national commission, will tell you, Philadelphia and Pennsylvania have already contributed over $3,500,000 of that fund. It is a national enterprise, having its existence in virtue of two laws of Congress. It is under the management, not of Philadelphia, nor of Pennsylvania, but of a commissioner and alternate from every State in the Union and every Territory, who, though acting under the commission of the President of the United States, have their traveling expenses and hotel bills, when on duty as commissioners, paid out of the municipal fund of Philadelphia by virtue of a special appropriation made in addition to her contribution of $3,500,000, to which her citizens are daily adding. The action proposed to-day cannot give national character to the exhibition; for but for the action of Congress it would have no existence; but for the nominations of governors of States and Territories and the appointments of the President it would have no commission to take charge of it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right at this point?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does not the gentleman know that at the time when the action of Congress was taken, authorizing the appointment of these gentlemen from different States, the idea that the Government should ever be called on for one dollar of money was directly and squarely repudiated?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not yield further.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish to say——

Mr. KELLEY. I yielded for a question, not a speech. There are gentlemen besides the gentleman from Maine who have a right to be heard on this floor, though he does not seem to recognize the fact to-day, or at other times.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman answer my question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor, and must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I understood the gentleman to yield.

Mr. KELLEY. I did yield for a question; but I do think that other gentlemen besides the gentleman from Maine have a right occasionally to express their opinions in this Hall.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded to me to ask him a question, and the question I put was exactly in point; and I hope now I may be allowed, in the wisdom of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to have an answer to that question, to which I am fairly entitled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor and does not yield.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, when the subject was under discussion there was active opposition on the question as to where the exhibition should be held. New York was anxious to have it held there. Other cities were named. There was a contest which led to many foolish expressions of opinion on this floor. Among others was that of representatives from Pennsylvania, that Pennsylvania and Philadelphia would pay the whole expense. And, sir, I now say that if the other States of the Union can afford to have Pennsylvania bear their respective shares of the expenses, she will do her whole duty in support of the honor of the nation. The exhibition may not in that event be so grand as it ought to be. She may not be able to do all that the thirty-seven States united could do. Her people may not be able to do what the forty millions of people of the United States could do. They will, however, to the extent of their ability, redeem the honor of the whole people of the United States, as pledged by the legislation of Congress, which created this national exhibition, and which foreign ministers as astute as Prince Bismarck believe our Government has invited them to participate in.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to yield five, ten, or fifteen minutes, as he may desire, to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who, on the nomination of the governor of Connecticut, holds the commission of the President of the United States as one of the managers of this "little Fourth of July Philadelphia celebration."

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. I have yielded the floor to my friend from Connecticut, who can probably answer your question better than I can.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I say in advance, if I have to make a statement at all comprehensible here, I must ask gentlemen not to interrupt me with constant questions. If the House will allow me, when I have made my statement, I will be then glad—not only willing, but very glad—to answer any inquiries which may serve to make this enterprise clear to the House and to the people.

I did not anticipate that just now we should have sprung upon us a discussion upon the question of granting pecuniary aid to this enterprise; but it seems involved, and I have no recourse but to refer to it incidentally. And I may as well begin at the beginning and tell gentlemen—they will pardon me for saying they do not all fully understand this question—what this international exhibition is. Not for myself, but for the cause, and for the national honor, I beg the attention of the House.

It was inevitable, Mr. Speaker, that there should be a great celebration in 1876. A million minds thought of it. How should that celebration be conducted, and where? Naturally, it was supposed, there would be on the Fourth of July, and during that week, appropriate observances—important, interesting, and striking ceremonies; but it also occurred to many that this afforded us a great opportunity for one of those grand international exhibitions which have been coming into style, marking the nineteenth century, and giving evidence of the progress of Christian civilization. And I say no money has been expended by a civilized Christian nation, since 1800, more to the real advantage of their people than for these grand exhibitions. It was proposed that we should have one; we have not had one. We had a preliminary attempt at one in New York in 1853, yet remembered by the great industrial interests of the country as of marked importance. It was proposed that we should not only have a grand national but an international exhibition. No other nation can, like us, point to a definite time and say, then the nation was born. It was, evidently, a matter of great interest to the world that we should show the progress we had made in this century in all things—our marvelous increase in population, and our wonderful advance in industry.

Why, sir, if you will sit down for half an hour in consultation with those who have seen previous exhibitions, and have spent time on the examination of all such exhibitions, you will see that no nation can ever show the world what we can show it. This exhibition has its interests besides those merely pecuniary. But looked at in that light, it will repay to us ten times over the amount of money any one ever thought of asking from the Federal Government or from individuals. It will be of infinite advantage to us. Already the other nations have had some faint intimations of our capacity in the show we made at London, Paris, and Vienna. In proportion to the very imperfect and ill-regulated display we made at those places, we gained more prizes and more honor than any other people. And in a comparatively insignificant matter, we all remember how a flush of pride came to the cheeks and moisture to the eyes of millions of our people when the news came that the yacht America was ahead and "all the rest nowhere."

I wish to say in addition that we have so far committed ourselves that we cannot retreat without shame, without great national mortification; and I will tell you why. I do not speak for myself. I ask nothing. I am not responsible for the existing embarrassment. The governor of my State sent for me and asked me if I would undertake to serve as a commissioner under the act of Congress. I have served two years and given several months' time and labor without compensation, and we ask for none. I speak as one of that commission, and for the time being its president. We speak of our duties under an act of the national Legislature. In its preample it recites:

Whereas the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America was prepared, signed, and promulgated in the year 1776 in the city of Philadelphia; and whereas it behooves the people of the United States to celebrate, by appropriate ceremonies, the centennial anniversary of this memorable and decisive event, which constituted the 4th day of July, anno Domini 1776, the birthday of the nation; and whereas it is deemed fitting that the completion of the first century of our national existence shall be commemorated by an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind, in comparison with those of older nations; and whereas no place is so appropriate for such an exhibition as the city in which occurred the event it is designed to commemorate; and whereas, as the exhibition should be a national celebration, in which the people of the whole country should participate, it should have the sanction of the Congress of the United States: Therefore—

These are your words, gentlemen, not ours—

Be it enacted, &c., That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held—

"American and foreign arts," you observe; and how held?—

under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876—

Pray note the words "under the auspices of the Government of the United States." I do not know how you could make language any more decisive to constitute this a national exhibition.

A VOICE. What is the date?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The date of the act is March 3, 1871, nearly three years ago.

I read again:

That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876.

SEC. 2. That a commission, to consist of not more than one delegate from each State, and from each Territory of the United States, whose functions shall continue until the close of the exhibition, shall be constituted, whose duty it shall be to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition, and, after conference with the authorities of the city of Philadelphia, to fix upon a suitable site within the corporate limits of the said city where the exhibition shall be held.

SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall be appointed within one year from the passage of this act by the President of the United States, on the nomination of the governors of the States and Territories respectively.

SEC. 4. That in the same manner there shall be appointed one commissioner from each State and Territory of the United States, who shall assume the place and perform the duties of such commissioner or commissioners as may be unable to attend the meetings of the commission.

SEC. 5. That the commission shall hold its meetings in the city of Philadelphia, and that a majority of its members shall have full power to make all needful rules for its government.

Now I ask the House to observe the language of the next section:

SEC. 6. That the commission shall report to Congress at the first session after its appointment a suitable date for opening and for closing the exhibition; a schedule of appropriate ceremonies for opening or dedicating the same; a plan or plans of the buildings; a complete plan for the reception and classification of articles intended for exhibition; the requisite custom-house regulations for the introduction into this country of the articles from foreign countries intended for exhibition; and such other matters as in their judgment may be important.

The commissioners are ordered by the statute to report these things immediately upon their first organization. And they have to report again this winter, because they could not report at all completely at that time, and they will in a few days lay their second report before Congress in obedience to your orders.

And now, in section 7, I come to what some gentlemen have urged as an objection to us, and an objection thrown in right here in front of our movement, which is not now asking for compensation:

SEC. 7. That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States—

We have not asked for one farthing of compensation for ourselves—and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

We have not run you in debt one farthing. We have obeyed the law. You are not liable for one cent of the expenses we have incurred. Philadelphia put $75,000 at our disposal for necessary preliminary expenses, and every dollar has been expended honestly, for necessary expenses, as we can show by the vouchers. We have obeyed the law, and the Government is not responsible. It was perfectly right, in this preliminary act, to give notice to us and the world that the commission should not run the United States into debt. But why put this in? Simply because in all the previous sections there had been declared such a complete nationalization of the enterprise that possibly some might infer that the Government was pecuniarily responsible for us. But I will recur to that subject. I proceed now to the eighth section:

SEC. 8. That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for, of the proposed exhibition—the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners, for publication in their respective countries.

We are not to blame for this.

The chairman of the committee says I must draw to a close soon. I beg for ten minutes more, not for myself, but as representative of the commission.

VOICES. Agreed; go on.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well; take ten minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Remember the section I have just read.

In accordance with that act, and simply obeying his duty under the statutes, the President of the United States, unable himself to attend by reason of the death of his father, sent the Secretary of the Navy to Philadelphia, who, on the 4th of July, in the name of the President, read a proclamation of the President to the assembled tens of thousands there, announcing to the world what had been done by the commission in reference to this exposition. And he there proclaimed, not to the people there alone but to the world, that an international exposition would here be held, and commended that exhibition to all nations. Copies of that proclamation were given to the diplomatic representatives here of all foreign countries. There was also a circular, through the Secretary of State, setting forth the character of the exposition, that it was international, and that foreign exhibitors were desired here; and the regulations for foreign exhibitors were also distributed by the State Department, all being done as the act directs.

That went to all nations, and some half dozen of them have accepted what they considered an invitation. Bismarck, with that straightforward, common sense which makes him as much a Yankee as a German, thought that we meant what we said, and he submitted our invitation to the proper authorities, and it was accepted; therefore Germany will be here. Italy will be here; Austria will be here; others are coming. Europe understands what has been done even better than the people in general of the United States. There have been long explanatory editorials in the leading papers of every capital in Europe. Our advertisements were in every catalogue in Vienna; in every language spoken in Europe; and this was done upon invitation. All nations tell us they wish to come; that they cannot afford to stay away. England, France, Germany, Russia, Austria, Italy tell us so.

But here is this difficulty: the Secretary of State says that when he comes to look at the letter of the act very carefully, he finds that he is not directly authorized to extend an invitation; that the word "invite" is not used in the act. And we do not complain; he is only desirous to conform strictly to the law, and that is his duty.

But the President is told to proclaim this as an international exhibition. He has sent notice to that effect to everybody in the world. Now the Secretary of State turns around and says, "On the whole, I do not think we can say 'invite.'" Already three or four governments have accepted what they understood to be an invitation. Yet the Secretary says, "On the whole, I do not think I am authorized to use the word 'invite.'"

Now, sir, perhaps a Philadelphia lawyer would say—and they are the shrewdest in the world—that he really had no authority to use any such word. It is to correct this oversight or defect in the charter that we are here to-day; nothing more and nothing less. We should go forward or back, one or the other. Now, if you take that correspondence of the State Department and that proclamation of the President, and say that, as gentlemen, you can go back, then you have a different apprehension of what is proper from what I entertain.

The Centennial Committee to-day only ask that you should really say, what you have virtually said before, that you shall authorize the word "invite" to be frankly and squarely used; not to tell other nations that we will be glad to see them here but that we do not ask them to come. Now, if I had an invitation to dinner on terms like those already used, I should be very much surprised to find the door closed in my face if I undertook to act upon it. We ask now that this technical oversight be corrected.

As this matter is brought up, I say now frankly and squarely that during this session we shall submit a proposition, and ask to have it fairly considered and fully heard, for Government aid. I say "Strike, but hear me;" this is not my cause, but the national cause; it is the cause of this commission, composed of ninety-four members, from forty-seven States and Territories.

I beg you to listen. I ask you to say whether you can expend three or four millions of dollars anywhere else as well as in this. You are ready to put your forty to sixty millions a year to build up an army and navy, to provide the enginery of war, for the mangling of our fellow-beings. But remember we are closing the nineteenth century. The time is coming when the millions of the treasure of the people will be thought more valuable for certain purposes of peace, industry, and progress than for murdering our fellow-men. A new era has come upon the world. You cannot afford to throw aside this exhibition with a quibble upon the letter of an act.

One word more. It is said this is a local affair. I deny it. The nation has given its sanction to this great celebration by the messages which have been sent to all the world. Philadelphia had the great honor of being the birthplace of the Declaration of Independence. You, the Congress, have said that there is no place so proper as Philadelphia for this celebration.

Some say that Philadelphia will make money out of it. I deny it. She has discounted her profit already; she has put her hand in her pocket and has laid down all and more than she might be able to make out of the enterprise. Philadelphia, by her private citizens, has subscribed something like $1,000,000 in behalf of this exposition. As a city she has voted $575,000. The State has given $1,000,000 as a State. This State appropriation is to go into what, to be sure, will be a permanent building, but a building which will be adapted to our service, and entirely surrendered to us for the exposition of 1876. Over $3,000,000 have been devoted to us in that single State of Pennsylvania, and more has been promised. No, sir; even if we condescend to a calculation as to what may be the profits of Philadelphia saloons and street cars, her patriotic citizens have given all that in advance.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLEY. I must object to that. There are some other gentlemen to whom I had promised to yield. I did not yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that he might yield the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not directly discussing the pecuniary question. I am only advocating a resolution which shall enable the Government to complete its invitation to foreign nations.

Mr. KELLEY. I am willing the gentleman from Connecticut shall hear the question, and then I desire to yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. MELLISH. Will not the passage of this bill furnish a precedent for assistance to other enterprises, on various pretexts, in coming years? If Philadelphia has assistance this year, will not Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Chicago, New York, Boston, and other cities come in in their turn?

Mr. KELLEY. I must object to a speech.

Mr. MELLISH. And will not the argument be irresistible that, one city having had this subsidy, others are equally entitled to consideration? Will not this be virtually pledging the financial encouragement of the Government to a series of great exhibitions throughout the country?

Mr. KELLEY. I must resume the floor. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It was addressed to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Very well.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Whenever Chicago shows that the Declaration of Independence was proclaimed one hundred years ago on her soil, and that the time has come for a celebration thereof—the centennial anniversary of the birth of the Republic—then the gentleman's question will be appropriate.

Mr. MELLISH. Will you vote for aid to such an enterprise?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Yes; even though it be a hundred or a thousand years hence. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Lest the inquiries of my colleague [Mr. MELLISH] may be construed as indicating a hostility on the part of the city of New York to this proposed exhibition, growing out of the alleged prejudice or jealousy of the city of New York toward the city of Philadelphia, I desire to say that such a view of a question of this character is derogatory of the city of New York, and places her before the country in what I deem a false position. Without assuming to represent that city, (for I represent but one humble portion of it,) I think I can say that this proposed centennial exhibition in Philadelphia has the best wishes of the people of the city of New York for its final success. We can afford to give to Philadelphia every possible advantage for any enterprise of this or any other character, when such enterprise is a national advantage as this would be.

Many, many years have rolled by since the importance of Philadelphia, commercially or otherwise, made her an object of jealousy on the part of the city of New York. We claim to be pre-eminent—the metropolis of this country, cosmopolitan in our feelings, liberal toward any other section of the Union, not envious of any possible prosperity that may fall to the lot of any other portion of the Union or any other city.

While on the floor, allow me to say that I was a member of the committee that originally reported the bill to which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has referred. The subject, when first presented in this House, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee gave to the subject great deliberation, and much examination of its probable effect, and how far it would commit this Government to guaranteeing the success of the proposed enterprise. We took a higher view of this celebration than to regard it as a mere exhibition local to the city of Philadelphia. We looked upon it as national. In view of the great movement in which mind is made predominant over matter—the movement now going on throughout the civilized world, in which the interchange of commodities, of information, of inventions, of commercial and manufacturing industries, is made paramount to military conflicts between nations—we looked upon an enterprise of this character, emanating from the greatest of all agricultural, commercial, and mechanical nations, as conducing to perpetuate international peace. Hence we favored this enterprise, and we favored Philadelphia as the location, regarding that city as peculiarly adapted for such an enterprise; and we deem the occasion—the hundredth anniversary of the birth of this great nation—to be the fitting time for this great national work to be brought into actual, living existence.

Mr. MELLISH. Will my colleague allow me one word?

Mr. WOOD. I will yield if the gentleman does not wish to make an argument.

Mr. MELLISH. I wish to disclaim any intention of intimating by my question to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that any jealousy was entertained by the city of New York as against Philadelphia. I am quite certain no such feeling exists. My question was not put in that spirit, but solely in the interests of the national Treasury.

Mr. WOOD. Sir, I do not understand that the bill reported from this committee involves the expenditure of a single dollar of public money. When the occasion arises, I shall be prepared to be heard upon the distinct and isolated question how far we are committed to make any appropriation from the national Treasury for this object. The question now presented is simply whether we shall not remedy a difficulty arising under the construction of the existing law. Congress passed a law imposing upon the President certain duties in connection with this enterprise. The President has acted upon his own construction of the measure, and has in part performed his duty under it; but when he undertakes to perform that duty in all its parts, he is met by an objection upon the part of the Secretary of State as to whether, under the law, the President has the right to exercise any judgment at all with reference to these invitations. Now, this resolution simply proposes we shall give to him the power to do—what? To invite the nations of Europe. And there is a graver reason for this case. All the universal exhibitions of Europe have been national enterprises; and European nations have officially, through their governments, invited us to participate in them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to finish my statement.

Mr. KELLEY. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman if I had time; but I will now yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. KILLINGER. I hope the time for this debate will be extended.

Mr. KELLEY. If the previous question be ordered I will gladly give the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] more time, and let the gentleman from Maine be heard, as well as other gentlemen.

Mr. KILLINGER. Will the gentleman allow me five minutes?

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to yield to any Pennsylvania Representative; I want the people of the other thirty-six States and Territories to be heard on this floor.

Mr. KILLINGER. I wish Pennsylvanians to take notice of the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the Representatives from the interior of Pennsylvania being heard.

Mr. KELLEY. I demand the previous question; and in the hour to which I am entitled, after the main question has been ordered, I propose to yield further to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] as well as the gentleman from Maine, and others.

Mr. KILLINGER. I hope the House will refuse to second the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 14.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] and ask him how much time he wants?

Mr. WOOD. Only two or three minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. Take five, sir.

Mr. WOOD. When interrupted, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the necessity for the adoption of this resolution, and to the fact that it involved the appropriation of not one dollar; that it does not commit this House hereafter by the most distant construction of this resolution to voting a single dollar. I for one, while I am in favor of this resolution and this enterprise, reserve to myself the right to vote and act as I please when the question of appropriation comes up hereafter in support of the exhibition itself.

All of the European nations—England, France, and Austria, every one of the nations of Europe which has held these exhibitions—have officially, through their governments, invited this Government to participate. And in the case of Austria she went much further; she not only invited us to participate, but she helped to pay the expenses for the transmission of some of the goods of exhibitors from Trieste to the city of Vienna for the purpose of that exhibition. Not only were we officially invited, but in every case this Government, without any act of Congress inviting it to do so or authorizing it to do so, officially consented to take part, and did take part, in these exhibitions.

Mr. KASSON. I am very anxious, as I said before, we should come to a vote directly on a point which will make it intelligible to everybody. If we give an invitation in the manner proposed, I wish to say frankly I shall feel the Congress of the United States is bound to provide a suitable building and all other arrangements for a noble and worthy international exhibition.

One word further. The gentleman says he does not regard this as touching the question of appropriation. Hitherto the Government has declined to formally invite; they have simply notified what was going on. It is now proposed to invite. If we do invite them to dinner, we must provide a house to take it in. It is that point I call to the attention of the gentleman and other gentlemen who propose to speak, because I feel we must go on if this is adopted. I do not say we must not go on; but I do not wish to vote under an impression that, after inviting foreign governments to take part, we are at liberty to decline to make suitable appropriations.

Mr. WOOD. If there was any valid objection, or any reason for the objection, existing in the mind of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] it would have applied to the original bill itself, which was passed in 1871. In that act we directly instructed the President to give invitations; and so far as the authority of Congress is concerned he had power to do all which was necessary to be done. At that moment we gave a national character to this exhibition when the appointment of these commissioners was originally confided to this House, each member of Congress naming two commissioners for each congressional district. And therefore in the original bill itself we did all we could do to give a national character to this enterprise. But, sir, that does not necessarily commit us to the appropriation of money to erect a building. The European governments in no case have done that, but they have obtained certain departments for the exhibitors of their respective countries. That is what they have done; and there is, therefore, I think, really no objection to this. The case has been correctly stated by those who favor the bill; and I shall certainly vote for it.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. I do not often ask the attention of this House to any remarks I am to make, and I would not now had not my colleague from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] it seems to me, rendered it absolutely necessary for me to say one word in reply to the remarks which fell from him. Those remarks were claimed to be made in the spirit of economy. Now, sir, I admire the spirit of economy, and believe it should rule in the Congress of the United States always. I believe it should rule in the country everywhere, always. But, sir, there is a true economy, and there is a false economy, as there is an expenditure of money which brings profit, and an expenditure of money which brings nothing back for it. This is sometimes forgotten. Sir, I do not believe that in this matter my colleague spoke for the State of Maine when he suggested here that she stood back and looked on the centennial and said, "It is glorious; go on; make it glorious; make the nation proud in view of it; but if it is to cost a dollar, then Maine steps to one side." Now, sir, Maine has no such spirit of economy in her bosom as that. She was a part of the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and is proud of her mother to-day. She was a part of one of the original States, and was in at the birth of the Republic. Ay, sir, it is well for us to go back now and then to that nursery of this Republic of ours and behold her in her weakness and in her childhood; and then, coming up from there, follow her through her growth from childhood to where she stands to-day, a giant in the eyes of the world; follow her to that terrible struggle of the rebellion, when she built navies, when she raised armies, when she paid off all her indebtedness, and came out a more noble republic than she ever was before, her industry increased a hundred-fold, her prosperity doubled, notwithstanding that terrible war; follow her through, until you stand with her to-day before the world, great, glorious, and beautiful.

Why, sir, the gentleman's city of Ellsworth, year after year, has voted to commemorate the birth of this Republic, appropriated money for the purpose; and all the cities of this country have done the same, and have done well in so doing. And now we come to the hundredth birthday of our country; and the Government, already recognizing the centennial as a fixed fact by the act which it has passed, may be asked to appropriate money, for what? To make that centennial commensurate with the Republic itself. Why, sir, I can say, as for myself, when that time comes, when we are called upon to appropriate that money, if I am here, my vote shall be for such appropriation as shall make the centennial what it ought to be. And, sir, I dare go back to my constituents, I dare say to them now and here, notwithstanding this spirit of economy which is hovering all around us to-day, that if they allow me to be their representative, my vote will be in accordance with what I am saying.

Sir, I do not wish Maine to stand behind in this; I wish her to come forward as a part of the Republic. I know, if I know the citizens of Maine, that when the time comes she will respond heartily and stand shoulder to shoulder with Pennsylvania, rejoicing that Philadelphia, the birthplace of American liberty, is the city in which this centennial is to celebrate itself.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I call the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was operating before the morning hour was through.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield now to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PARKER.]

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for the privilege of making a few remarks upon this very important subject.

As a Representative from New Hampshire, I take great pride in announcing to this House that the Granite State was the first of any of the States to respond through her Legislature to the call for aid, and thereby recognize this great enterprise. Although New Hampshire does not possess so great an extent of territory and fertility of soil as many of her sister States, she is never behind any of them in anything which involves the interest of the common people, nor is she wanting in patriotism or noble deeds. Being one of the "original thirteen," and intimately connected with the struggles which secured our national independence and the early history of the Republic, she would be untrue to herself and her history if she did not give this enterprise her hearty approval and earnest co-operation.

The centennial celebration of our national birthday is an event in the history of the world and republican government which will enlist the warmest sympathies of every true American; and it will be a proud day for us when we can lay before, not only our own citizens but the representatives of all the civilized nations of the world, the evidences of our progress and intelligence in science and art, and in all that contributes to the happiness and prosperity of a people, and say to them that all this has been accomplished in the first one hundred years of our existence as a nation.

New Hampshire stands committed to extend a helping hand in this great work, and, true to herself, she will not be found wanting, believing it to be an occasion worthy of her best efforts. The memory of her patriotic sires who fought at Bunker Hill and through the revolutionary war, as well as a high sense of duty, prompts her to this action. Let other States follow the example which New Hampshire has set before them, and the work will be well done; and the year 1876 will be the brightest page in our country's history.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER.]

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I wish to say a few words upon this subject, and for this reason: I have received a copy of resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey upon this subject, which I will read:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has, by an act passed in 1871, provided for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the American Independence, in the city of Philadelphia, and the President of the United States has by proclamation invited the attention of all nations to this celebration; and whereas it is absolutely essential to the success of this proposed celebration that a considerable sum of money should be promptly raised: Therefore,

Resolved, (the House of Assembly concurring,) That we request the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Jersey to vote for such an appropriation as shall enable those having the matter in charge to discharge the duties devolved upon them in accordance with the requirements of the occasion.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Now, though that resolution may not be exactly pertinent to the matters now before the House, still it is of some importance so far as this question is concerned. Already the subject of this celebration, to take place a century after the Declaration of Independence, has attracted the attention of every State and Territory of this nation, and has attracted the attention of the civilized world. We, therefore, are committed, to a very great extent, to the matter—committed so far that we cannot go back.

The bill now before the House proposes simply that some official steps should be taken in reference to giving notice to foreign nations. So far as this subject is concerned, it is very clear that it is not a matter of Pennsylvania, or New York, or New Jersey; but it is a matter which concerns the whole nation. We are committed to it. And when that great anniversary shall come around, the anniversary of freedom, an anniversary which shows not only freedom, enlightenment, culture, but great mechanical progress, progress in the arts and sciences, I take it that then we will feel disposed to rise as one man and give full force and effect to that occasion.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am obliged to the courtesy of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for the privilege of raising a voice from Maryland in behalf of this bill. Mr. Speaker, the hearts of our people are entwined with the hearts of the people of Pennsylvania, and by interchange of views upon festive and many other occasions we feel that the interests of Maryland and the interests of Pennsylvania are not only one, but are in common with the great interests of our entire people.

We claim that the city of Baltimore, which I in part represent, is the great metropolis of the South; that it not only represents the South in all great measures concerning the prosperity and the honor of our country, but that on this question of sustaining the centennial exposition the interests of the South are entwined and are one with the interests of Pennsylvania and her sister States across the border line. We have no jealousy to gratify in regard to anything that will contribute to the prosperity of the great city of Philadelphia. Baltimore has already outstripped her as a commercial rival. And when our lines of improvement by railroad to the great West have been completed, and with our many lines of ocean steamships and our large and increasing manufacturing industries, may we not bid fair to stand in competition with the great metropolis of the North, the city of New York? We, sir, look upon this centennial celebration as one that will not only give an opportunity where the skilled labor, the mechanical genius, the works of our artisans will be spread out before the gaze and admiration of the civilized world, but also as an enterprise that will add to the honor and glory of the Republic.

Now, sir, although the bill before the House does not contemplate the appropriation of money to carry out this great enterprise in which the whole country is so much interested, and concernig which there should be no division, political, sectional, or otherwise, I am here to say that at the proper time, when money is required in order that this great exhibition shall be sustained upon the platform which our country occupies before the world, when it is required that money shall be used in order to show that we can produce an exposition unequaled by any other nation of the world; then the voice of Maryland will be raised in behalf of an appropriation commensurate with the extent of the enterprise. Maryland will, I believe, sustain its Representatives in voting such sum of money from the Federal Treasury as will sustain the faith of the Republic pledged to this great national enterprise by the Forty-second Congress, and thus maintain it in a manner and on a scale commensurate with the greatness and dignity of the country.

The centennial exposition, Mr. Speaker, is not a local or State enterprise; its usefulness and importance cannot be confined by State lines or geographical divisions, but will be as limitless as are the resources of the country. Every American whose heart is animated with devotion to the progress and prosperity of our Union will take pride in every movement that adds to its glory and renown. In this exposition, which is to commemorate the birth of the Republic, the progress of mechanics, the arts and sciences, the products of our agricultural and manufacturing industries—in a word, the triumphs of our people in every department, under the beneficent rule of popular government and free institutions, will testify to the nations of the world the true greatness and manifest destiny of this great country. Not only, therefore, should the pending bill pass the House, but false economy should not stay our hands in voting any money that may be required to make the centennial exposition in every respect worthy of the dignity and honor of the country and the American people.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] for three minutes, that being the time fixed by him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will not trespass at all upon your patience. When this bill was first brought in I thought I saw its bearing. I saw that it committed the Government, in the invitation to be extended, to make this a national enterprise. I desired only to elicit such debate as should give us a thorough understanding of what we were about to do; and that it would become the bounden duty of the Congress of the United States, without niggardliness or anything but having in view the glory and honor of our country, to make such appropriations as will be necessary to carry out this exhibition. Whoever else may fail, we cannot fail.

Now, sir, I think we are so far committed by the acts of Congress, (although there is a provision in the original act that we shall not be called upon for an appropriation,) and our Government has taken such measures through their diplomatic corps, that we are committed to the nations of the world in this exhibition. When we do anything at all let us do it frankly, man-fashion, and openly. Let us invite the nations of the world to meet us not by any uncertain sound.

There is but one thing that I would have desired to have had in this bill. Perhaps our Government will take care to have that done. That is, that we should have invited the artisans of the world through their governments to come here and see what we have done by strong hands and willing hearts, and not to have invited the governments as such.

Mr. KELLEY. I will extend the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER,] that I may make a suggestion. The invitation, though addressed to the government is, that they invite their artisans; and the invitation sent by the executive commission is that the respective governments shall induce their artisans to come in person to our country to attend this exhibition.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have made my suggestion, because in the events we are about to celebrate no dukes or marquises except one took part; and that one democratized himself before identifying himself with our cause. But I assume that the invitation will be for commissions of artisans of each country to come here and interchange with us their knowledge in the great arts which benefit mankind.

Therefore I hope the bill will pass. Certain it is that Massachusetts, the scene of the first revolutionary strife, and of the first act that gave birth to the country, will not be found voting against anything which shall commemorate her glory as first and foremost in the great war of independence. And when we shall have extended this invitation, I hope to hear no speech and no vote against appropriating any sum of money that can be demonstrated to be necessary to carry out this enterprise. I have come to the conclusion that our Government is already committed. It has gone forth to the world that this is a national celebration. We must stand by it, and see to it that it does honor to the event and honor to the country.

Mr. WOOD. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts sits down I wish to say that I think he errs in stating that a vote in favor of this bill is to be construed as committing the members so voting to support any appropriation asked for.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not any appropriation asked for, but any appropriation that can be demonstrated to be necessary, whatever it may be.

Mr. WOOD. That is very ambiguous and indefinite. I wish to stand uncommitted upon the question of appropriation, although I am in favor of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, I cannot invite a man to my house unless I expect to give him a dinner when he comes. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] for five minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has stated this question very frankly. The adoption of this bill commits the House—and will be so accepted in the minds of the people of the country—to an appropriation of from three to seven million dollars for the centennial celebration. Like the gentleman from Massachusetts, I believe that having pledged ourselves by inviting foreign governments and their citizens to come and take part in this centennial celebration, we cannot avoid all the appropriations necessary to make it a great success.

Now, sir, it ought to be understood by the House of Representatives that the plans for this celebration are all completed, and that they absolutely require an expenditure of about $8,000,000. It is said that $3,000,000 have been contributed by the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. KELLEY. Three million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. One million dollars of the amount furnished by the State of Pennsylvania is, I understand, for the erection of a public building, which is to be a permanent fixture in the park at Philadelphia.

Mr. KELLEY. It is to be used as an art gallery during the exhibition.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. One gentleman connected with this commission assured me that this enterprise will require, before we get through with it, an expenditure of $7,000,000 from the General Government.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No one has any authority to say that.

Mr. KELLEY. No man ever had such authority.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. A gentleman from Ohio, a member of the commission, assured me that it would take $7,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. He ought to be off the commission.

Mr. KELLEY. Seven million dollars it is supposed will cover the whole cost. Three million five hundred thousand dollars have already been contributed.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. We all know that appropriations of this character always exceed the estimates. We are frankly told by gentlemen here that the Government will have to furnish about $5,000,000; and a vote in favor of this bill means that there shall be an expenditure of at least that amount, with a strong probability that it will go a million or two beyond.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does not the communication which the President of the United States has already made to the governments of the world, informing them that we propose to have an international exhibition, and saying that he hopes delegations of their people will be present, and that the occasion will tend to strengthen friendly feeling among the people of the several nations—does not this action of the President pledge the Government just as much as will the passage of this bill?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that what has been done in reference to this matter embarrasses Congress; but the action now proposed will embarrass us still more.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does not the gentleman consider that we are already pledged to this enterprise?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. We are not pledged, and for the reason that in the law authorizing the appointment of these commissioners Congress reserved to itself the right to refuse to appropriate one dollar of money. But if we pass this bill it means that Congress is committed to this very large expenditure.

Now, we have in all sorts of ways committed ourselves to the declaration that we are going to cut down the expenses of the Government; but here is a proposition that implies an expenditure of $5,000,000; and a large part of the appropriation for this purpose will have to be made during the present session; yet it is a fact that neither the Committee on Ways and Means nor the Committee on Appropriations has had an opportunity upon this bill to say whether we have this money at our command or whether we are able to appropriate it.

As I understand from the information we have and the debates which have taken place here, we can only avoid the necessity of increasing the already heavy burdens of taxation by the strictest public economy. The House has pledged itself to that. It has resolved that it will neither increase taxation nor borrow money. But here is a proposition committing us to a great expenditure, not required for the proper transaction of any public business. This is not in the direction of economy. If we should finally conclude to make the appropriations necessary to have a great world's fair, it will then be time enough to issue our invitations. The passage of this resolution will be regarded everywhere as an assumption by the General Government of the whole possible expense. Not another dollar will be raised by private subscription. The House should pause before taking this step. We can scarcely retrace it with honor.

Before this resolution passes committing the Government to the expenditure of this money, I would like to know whether the Ways and Means Committee can furnish the money, and whether the Appropriations Committee thinks it ought to be expended. I am sure if the committees especially charged with the consideration of all matters relating to our finances were permitted to advise the House they would protest against the appropriations ultimately contemplated in this resolution. In my judgment the resolution should not pass.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily glad that this discussion has assumed a more national character than when it commenced. I am myself willing now and here to commit myself to vote for such an appropriation as shall be made to appear necessary, in order that this great centennial celebration of the Republic may be worthy of the country, and worthy of the age in which we live. This celebration is not for Philadelphia, and is not for Pennsylvania. It is a celebration which ought to awaken and arouse the spirit of patriotism of every American citizen, whether he live in the East or in the West, in the North or in the South. I will not admit that to Pennsylvania shall be the honor of this celebration. We in the West desire to participate in it. There are those in the West who went from the East. We have the traditions of the country in our breast as deeply engraven as those in the East. I am therefore unwilling to admit we are not in the West interested in this celebration; and I say we ought to be willing now to commit ourselves to the honorable—yea, to the most completely organized celebration of this anniversary of our country.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] who has just spoken seems unwilling that we should commit ourselves to the payment of a dollar. I wish to ask him and this House if it is proposed that the hundredth birthday of this country shall come round and this House of Representatives refuse to pay a dollar for this celebration? Are we willing that this hundredth birthday shall pass by without any recognition? No; let it be the grandest day which was ever written about in the history of America. Not only let it be a celebration for a day, but for a season. Let this celebration continue through the entire season. Let the millions of America find their way to the birthplace of America; and let Philadelphia be filled to overflowing from early spring to late in autumn. Let this be the grand event of the nineteenth century. I say it ought to be an occasion wherein shall be developed a wide national patriotism. I always believed that a Fourth of July celebration was, indeed, productive of good in the locality in which it might be held. This celebration is a national one, and therefore should be celebrated in a manner worthy of the entire people.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CROCKER.]

Mr. CROCKER. Mr. Speaker, when I heard the eloquent remarks of my colleague from Maine [Mr. FRYE;] when I saw that gentleman go right up to the work this morning and speak of Massachusetts as an old rock-bound State of seventy-eight hundred square miles, and say that Massachusetts was the mother of the State of Maine, I felt as though I wanted to say before I came to the question that I hoped the child would never look down on the parent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the question. I have heard something about committal. The very fact of the hundredth anniversary on the Fourth of July 1876, commits every man on the floor of this House. It is enough of itself. If there is an American heart here it is committed to that day. It is enough without going into details on the subject. It is enough for us to say that it is the hundredth anniversary of our national independence, which was cradled in that old State of Massachusetts, and which has permeated the Union until it now extends from the gentleman's State of Maine to Georgia—yea, even to the Gulf of Mexico and to the Pacific.

I am happy that I have been anticipated by one of my colleagues who has come up to the work; and I am willing to come up to the work. So far as economy is concerned, I will act with the closest economist in the House, my friend over the way; I will go as far as any one in economy. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, there is such a thing as false economy as well as a true one. No one feels the condition of the country more than I do, but we will find enough to meet every nation in Christendom who sees fit to come over to see the effect of our glorious institutions in one single century upon the people of this continent. I wish to be there; Massachusetts wants to be there; we want to show you our manufactures, and I wish every star of our noble galaxy of States to shine in its place. I wish every State to be there. I wish my southern brethren everywhere to come there. If we can inspire in them any new ideas in mechanics, if we can raise their feelings and ambitions to emulate us, I will go as far as any one. They are a part and parcel of us; they are a part and parcel of this country. They are as much mine, every State of them, as my own. As I said to a friend from the South, I do not represent Massachusetts; I represent the South as well as the North.

Now, sir, I did not rise to talk, but simply to express my feelings. I am ready to vote at any time and under any circumstances for any reasonable appropriation, to show this country, free and independent as she is, before all the crowned heads, if you please, and the dukes and marquises, that the world ever saw; and they will feel small, sir, they will feel small before a country only a century old, [laughter,] when they come to that good old city of brotherly love, and see what we produce and will show them there.

I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his courtesy in allowing me to make these remarks. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SYPHER.]

Mr. SYPHER. I have no Fourth of July speech to make on this subject, but I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without saying a word in favor of the centennial. I come from the extreme South; and it seems to me, in addition to the benefit we will derive from comparing views with other nations on the subject of our mechanical arts and products, that this is a great occasion for uniting in one common bond of national interest the different sections of our own country, that have been distracted and divided in the past. I think we will make this centennial a regular love-feast. We propose to come up from the South with our sugar and our cotton. We propose to ask the people who manufacture machinery and who have capital to invest to come to our section of the country and help us, if nothing more, to spin the two million bales of cotton which we make in excess of our consumption, and we will thereby double the value; instead of getting two hundred we will get four hundred million dollars for it, which will be for the benefit not only of that section but of the whole country. And thereby the centennial will not only be a great world's show-house, but it will be a national love-feast, in which we will not merely exhibit our products and our manufactures and our arts, but will consolidate the national sentiment, and bury forever that unhappy sectional spirit which has existed so long in this country, and which culminated in the bloody war through which we passed so recently. That, I conceive, Mr. Speaker, will be a greater benefit to us than any material benefit that we may derive from this national exhibition; and it is for this reason, coming from the section I do, that I advocate this especially, although we are poor in money. I shall give my vote for a reasonable appropriation for the benefit of this exposition.

Mr. KELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I had not yet sufficiently familiarized myself with the rules of this House to anticipate that the centennial question was coming up this morning, or indeed that it was coming up at all. Sir, Wisconsin is one of the youngest States of the Republic and becomingly modest; but my colleagues near me seem to feel that she should not remain silent during the discussion of this important question. Yielding to this feeling I make the venture and decide to express her sympathy, though I do it this morning in broken sentences and disconnected words.

Wisconsin traces her lineage and draws her life from Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and all the New England States; from New York, from Pennsylvania, and more remotely from the far South. Proud of her lineage and mindful of the valor and precepts of her fathers, the call of patriotism, whether for rejoicing or danger, has never in Wisconsin fallen on leaden ears. The first note of alarm which recently startled the Republic stirred her fields with patriotic life and moved her forests with stalwart men. Sir, when questions of this kind arise you may take it for granted that—whether in her fertile fields where summer harvests are tossed in golden billows, or in her northern pine-tops forever hymning the song of freedom, fresh as their own vernal beauty, perennial as her mountain streams that feed your great lakes and rivers on which floats the commerce of the nation—the voice of Wisconsin will be a unit in responding to Pennsylvania and the country for whatever shall be right, whatever shall be reasonable, whatever shall be just and patriotic.

Mr. KELLEY. I now call for a vote.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read, as follows:

Whereas, at various international exhibitions which have been held in foreign countries, the United States have been represented in pursuance of invitations given by the governments of those countries and accepted by our own Government: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be requested to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States in the year 1876.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 45.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the members present) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 206, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Barber, Beck, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Coburn, Cook, Donnan, Durham, Freeman, Garfield, Giddings, Eugene Hale, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hoskins, Kasson, Lawrence, McCrary, McLean, Mellish, Milliken, Monroe, Neal, Niblack, Potter, Read, James W. Robinson, Sherwood, John Q. Smith, Waldron, and James Wilson—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Ashe, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Bell, Berry Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Fort, Frye, Glover, Gooch, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Holman, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Mills, Mitchell, Moore, Morrison, Myers, Negley, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rawls, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standeford, Starkweather, Stephens, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—206.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Atkins, Barry, Bright, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Corwin, Creamer, Darrall, Duell, Eden, Foster, Gunckel, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hooper, Howe, Jewett, Kendall, Killinger, Lansing, Loughridge, Martin, McJunkin, Morey, Nesmith, Niles, Phillips, Pike, Purman, Rapier, Ray, William R. Roberts, St. John, Tremain, Walls, Charles W. Willard, and Woodford—38.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELLOGG. O, no; we want to save the time of the House for the appropriation bills.

The question was upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 4 in the affirmative.

So (one-fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up for consideration the report of the Committee on Elections upon the contested-election cases in West Virginia.

Mr. WHEELER. Upon that I raise the question of consideration. The Army appropriation has been the special order for fifteen days past, and I think it should be considered.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 118, noes 43.

So the House decided to proceed to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections.

WEST VIRGINIA ELECTION CASES.

The resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections were as follows:

Resolved, (first,) That Mr. Davis, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, (second,) That Mr. Hagans, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, (third,) That Mr. Wilson, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was elected upon the day lawfully prescribed for the election of Representatives in Congress, in the State of West Virginia, and is hereby admitted to a seat in this House.

Resolved, (fourth,) That Mr. Martin, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of West Virginia, was elected upon the day lawfully prescribed for the election of Representatives in Congress, in the State of West Virginia, and is hereby admitted to a seat in this House.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. On behalf of a minority of the Committee on Elections I submit the following resolutions, which I desire to have voted on at the proper time as a substitute for the resolutions reported by a majority of the committee:

Resolved, That Benjamin Wilson, who claims a seat in this House as Representative from the first congressional district of West Virginia, and B. F. Martin, who claims a seat in this House from the second congressional district of West Virginia, are not entitled to seats therein.

Resolved, That John J. Davis, who claims a seat in this House as Representative from the first congressional district of West Virginia, is entitled to such seat.

Resolved, That J. Marshall Hagans, who claims a seat in this House as Representative from the second congressional district of West Virginia, is entitled to such seat.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I do not yield for an amendment; I am willing to have the resolutions read; and now I enter a motion to recommit.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I desire to have these resolutions voted on at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. That will depend upon whether the House sustains the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] when he shall call for the previous question upon the report of the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Before entering upon the legal questions involved in this case I desire to say a word upon the situation in West Virginia. I gather from what has been said in a city paper, without imputing to my colleagues of the minority of the committee any desire to appeal to the partisan feelings of this House, that an appeal is in effect made to the partisan sympathies of a majority of this body. Upon that point I desire to say that in the first district of West Virginia, at the August election, Mr. Davis received 13,361 votes, and Mr. Wilson 12,948 votes—a clear and handsome majority for Mr. Davis.

Now, sir, I believe that I am understood as a true party man; and if any of the distinguished lawyers on the opposite side of the House, who I understand are to speak in support of the validity of the August election, will show me how I can, consistently with my oath and my honor, vote for the admission of Mr. Davis, whom I understand to be a most estimable and worthy gentleman, and to have received a majority of the votes in his district upon a fair contest, I will waive all questions of professional pride, and will promise to vote for his admission.

But, sir, Mr. Davis's claim to the seat rests upon a majority of votes received at the August election. Perhaps it is unfortunate for Mr. Davis that the claim of Mr. Hagans, from the second district, also rests upon a majority of votes received at the August election. A morning paper, whose editorials are, in the main, as I can bear witness, judicious and just, contains the following language:

The parties thus beaten by the people at the polls when a full vote was cast—that they should attempt by sharp practice to cheat the people out of their choice and get into Congress by a minority vote, is a sad commentary on the frailties of human nature.

It will be observed that not only in this newspaper, but in the minority report of the committee, Mr. Davis, a gentleman of great personal strength in this House, and a most worthy and estimable man, is worn, just as the old woman in the story wore her ribbon, on the congregation side of her bonnet. I call the attention of the House to the fact that if we indorse the August election as valid, not only Mr. Davis, but Mr. Hagans, takes his seat in this House.

I ask the attention of my republican friends to this point. Mr. Hagans was elected at the August election without the nomination of any party, after the congressional conventions of both parties had met in the second district and adjourned without making any nominations, in the belief that Representatives in Congress were not to be elected at the August election. More than that, Mr. Hagans, if elected at all, was elected not only after the republican convention of the second congressional district had adjourned without making any nomination, but he was elected upon a vote of only 3,441, which, according to the ruling in the case of Morey vs. McCranie, is a vote insufficient to elect a member of Congress where fraud or intimidation is alleged. I read the syllabus of the case to which I refer:

Morey vs. McCranie.—There were allegations of violence and intimidation in certain parishes where most of the votes were polled. It was held by the special committee that the vote of the House in the previous case of Sypher vs. St. Martin was "a limitation on the rule adopted in Sheldon's case," and that it is not sufficient for a claimant to obtain a majority of the votes in "peaceable parishes," when less than one-fourth of the legal electors resided in those parishes, and less than one-fifth of the registered vote was cast in them. The committee recommended that the election be declared void, and the House adopted their recommendation nem. con.

Now, I submit to the House that though there is no allegation in this case that there was fraud or intimidation, the vote given in Mr. Hagans's district was not one-fourth of the legal vote in that district, and so not sufficient under the principle stated in the case just cited, if such principle is applicable in this case.

Besides, not only does Mr. Hagans's right rest upon this small vote, but at the October election, his adversary, Mr. Martin, was elected upon an aggregate vote of 9,825. In the first district, though Mr. Davis appears to have received a majority vote in a fair contest, yet at the October election Mr. Wilson received 3,708 votes; and if the rule adopted in the case of Morey vs. McCranie is applicable in a case where there is no fraud or intimidation, then, too, the election of Mr. Wilson is by an insufficient vote within the authority of that case; and the election ought to be remanded.

Thus much, Mr. Speaker, I only say by way of prelude. The Committee on Elections were of opinion that the House expected of them a report upon the question which was the legal election day. Upon that question a majority of the committee have made their report; and beyond that question I ask the House to bear in mind that all the members of the majority have designed to express no opinion. I have made a motion to recommit. If, after the House has decided which is the legal election day, there should remain a question as to the sufficiency of the vote, though the committee has exhausted all the power it has, without authority to send for persons and papers, yet they are not to be understood as expressing an opinion against the power or the right or the duty of the House to recommit this question, as to the October election, particularly in the first district, giving the committee power to send for persons and papers to ascertain whether the uncertainty prevailing was a sufficient reason for remanding this election to the people, considering the paucity of the vote.

And upon that question, although in courts of criminal law and of civil law it is well settled that ignorance of the law cannot be pleaded, yet there are certain cases in equity where ignorance of the law may be pleaded. Where such ignorance does not appertain to a particular individual but to a whole community, where, as Lord Bacon said of the laws of Henry VII, nemo scit—nobody knows what the law is—it is a very grave question whether ignorance of the law on the part of a whole community be not sufficient authority for remanding an election. There is a legal maxim, to which I call the attention of the House without meaning to discuss it—communis error facit jus. Where there is a prevalent error, extending through a whole congressional district, may it or not legalize the election in the first district of West Virginia? Whether, if with power to send for persons and papers, the Committee on Elections should find that error was a common and prevalent error, any action should be taken by the House, the committee desires to express no opinion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me pass, with these preliminary observations, which I have designed and I hope the House has understood only as committing us to the opinion expressed as to which was the legal election day, to the consideration of the legal question in this case, which was the legal election day, in 1872—the fourth Thursday of August or the fourth Thursday of October? I observe, sir, in the minority report, on page 19, this statement:

The first section is but a substantial re-enactment of a section of the original constitution of the State; but this fact is not material to the discussion.

It is a little strange that the members of the Election Committee and Representatives in this House who are lawyers should be found so widely divided on this naked question of law. I think it results from a misapprehension of the majority or the minority of the committee as to the questions which decide this case.

Now the minority report says—and I speak of this minority report with a very sincere deference to my colleagues—that the first section is but a substantial re-enactment of a section of the original constitution of the State. The first section is:

The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

I wish I could get the attention of the House to this one point: If my colleagues in the minority are right, that this is but a substantial re-enactment of the constitution, then they have easy sailing in the deductions they make from it. But I challenge this statement at the very threshold. The original constitution of the State of West Virginia was:

The general election for State and county officers and members of the Legislature shall be held upon the fourth Thursday of October.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that right here is a pivotal point of this case. If I am wrong then the report of the majority of this committee goes to the wall.

The code of West Virginia not only re-enacted the constitutional provision—and I ask the attention of lawyers in this House to this proposition—the code of West Virginia went beyond the constitution, and enacted that not only State and county officers, but district and township officers, should be elected on the fourth Thursday of October. The code of West Virginia could add no sort of authority or force to the constitutional provision as to the election of State and county officers; but as to district and township officers I ask the attention of my colleagues in the minority to this fact. As to district and township officers, it was only by virtue of chapter 3 of the code that their election was provided for on the fourth Thursday of October. Right here lies a fatal fallacy, if I may be permitted to say so, in the report of the minority of the committee. The district officers who were named and specifically mentioned in section 1 of chapter 3 of the code—and I will ask my colleagues of the committee or any gentleman in this House to correct me if I am wrong—the only district officers who were to be elected under section 1 of chapter 3 of the code were circuit judges and Representatives in Congress.

The third chapter of the code went beyond the constitution, and provided not only for the election of State and county officers and members of the Legislature, but for the election of new classes of officers, to wit, district officers and township officers. Now, a fatal fallacy in the report of the minority of this committee, as it seems to me, is found on page 20 of their report, in these words:

The law of the State, the code of 1869, regulating the manner of holding the elections, prescribing the officers who should conduct the same, directing as to the making returns, &c., had reference to the State election, the election of the officers of the State government, as distinguished from the Federal Government. The election of Representatives in Congress was hinged on to the State election.

Now, I beg the pardon of my colleagues of the minority. They have no right to say that the election of Representatives in Congress was hinged on the State election. The first section says:

The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

What right had they to say that the election of members of Congress was hinged upon the State election any more than I have to say that the election of State officers was hinged upon the elections of members of Congress? They put it upon the language of the second section of the code, which is found in the report at the top of page 3:

SEC. 2. At the said elections in every year there shall be elected delegates to the Legislature, and one senator for every senatorial district, and in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, a governor, * * * a Representative in the Congress of the United States * * * for every congressional district.

The whole question in this case hinges directly, if I apprehend it correctly, on this point: is the election of members of Congress provided for in section 1, or in section 2, of the code of West Virginia? Section 1 provides:

The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

The second section is:

At the said elections in every year there shall be elected delegates to the Legislature, and one senator for every senatorial district. * * * * * and a Representative in the Congress of the United States, for the term beginning on the 4th day of March next after the election, for every congressional district.

Now, sir, section 66—and I call the attention of the lawyers of the House to this point—section 66 of this same chapter quoted in the report explicitly declares that Representatives in Congress are "officers." An officer is defined by Mr. Bouvier as "he who is lawfully invested with an office;" and a Representative in Congress is expressly cited as an "officer."

Now, if this law itself, if chapter 3 of the code, explicitly declares that a Representative in Congress is an "officer," then I would like to know if there is any lawyer in this House that dare dispute that a Representative in Congress is an officer—whether within the meaning of this act he is an officer—or not within the meaning of the constitution. Will any one deny that if he be defined in this very chapter of the code as an "officer," he is included in section 1 of chapter 3 providing the time for his election?

Now, I learn that certain members of this House are going to sustain the August election, and some of them put it on the ground that a Representative in Congress is not an "officer," though by section 66 of this same chapter declared to be an officer; and others put it upon the ground that if he be an officer he is not a "district" officer. I ask the attention of the House to section 2 of the code, which explicitly provides that a Representative in Congress shall be elected "for every congressional district." Now, if a member of Congress be an officer, as he is declared to be in this same chapter of the code, and if he is required to be elected "in every congressional district," I ask if there be any refuge from the conclusion, that within the meaning of this code he is a "district officer?"

Now notice the language of the code, and you will observe that the officers to be elected, as provided in section 2, are designated by the territorial divisions of the State within which they are to be elected. And, I repeat, by section 2 of the code, members of Congress are required to be elected "in every congressional district." Are they not district officers? Are they not plainly and beyond question intended to be included in the term "district officers?"

Now, I ask the attention of the House to the old election law of West Virginia, which has a very significant bearing upon this question. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

There shall be elected on the fourth Thursday of October, in the year 1864, and the same day in every year thereafter, delegates for the several delegate districts and counties not included in delegate districts; and one senator for every senatorial district.

And on the fourth Thursday of October, in the year 1864, and the same day in every second year thereafter, a governor, secretary of state, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general for the State, a Representative in the Congress of the United States for each congressional district, for the term commencing on the 4th day of March next after the election, and a prosecuting attorney, surveyor of lands, recorder, county treasurer, and the number of assessors prescribed by law for every county.

And on the fourth Thursday of October, in the year 1866, and the same day in every fourth year thereafter, a judge of the supreme court of appeals for the State, and a clerk of the circuit court, and a sheriff for every county.

And on the fourth Thursday in the year 1868, and the same day in every sixth year thereafter, a judge for every circuit, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I now call the attention of the House to the fact that under the old election law of West Virginia a Representative in Congress was required to be elected on the fourth Thursday of October, "and on the same day in every second year thereafter," in every congressional district. Now upon the question of construction of that statute I ask the Clerk to read from Smith's Commentaries on the Constitution.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 638. So, too, where one statute was undoubtedly under the consideration of the Legislature when passing another, the former ought, though long since expired, to be taken into consideration in construing the latter statute, and that for the reason that it is a rule in the construction of statutes that all which relate to the same subject, notwithstanding some of them may have expired, or are not referred to, must be taken to be one system, and construed consistently, and the practice has always been so.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask the Clerk also to read from Potter's Dwarris on Statutes and Constitutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The objection arising from the repeal of the former statute," said Lord Denman in Reg. vs. Stock, "is not insisted on, and does not seem to be tenable." In the case of Bussey vs. Story, 4 B. & A., Parke, J., said: "This act of Parliament repeals those of 32 Geo. III, and 41 Geo. III, the provisions of which are only so far material as they may aid in the construction of the enactments of the existing statute," &c.

According, then, to the received doctrine, a repealed act obliterated from the judicial mind, and "considered as if it had never passed," will often have more legal import a century later, from aiding the construction of subsequent statutes, than it ever possessed itself, while in viridi observantia. "This is shocking," as said by Mansfield, C. J., of a certain construction on wills; "but it has been followed in a hundred cases."

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I also ask the Clerk to read from Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law.

The Clerk read as follows:

The rule that statutes in pari materia are to be consulted for the construction of each other holds good though some of the statutes may have expired, or even been repealed, and whether they are referred to or not. "All acts which relate to the same subject," said Lord Mansfield, "notwithstanding some of them may be expired, or are not referred to, must be taken to be one system, and construed consistently."

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, this section 1 of the code providing for the election of "district officers and township officers," who are not mentioned in the constitution, has an important bearing upon this question. When you come to refer to the old election law, finding as you do that Representatives in Congress were required to be elected on the "fourth Thursday of October" in the year named, and in every second year thereafter, I ask if in this code, which was designed simply as a codification or an abbreviation of the previously existing laws, there is to be presumed any intention of changing the previously existing law requiring the election of these Representatives in Congress to be held upon that specific day to an ambulatory occasion?

Now, this section 2 of chapter 3 of the code provided for the election of district and township officers; a large class of officers that were not mentioned in the constitution. I have already asked any gentleman in the House to correct me if I was in error in stating that the only district officers alluded to in that section were circuit judges and Representatives in Congress.

But when this new constitution came to be adopted it provided only that "State and county officers" should be elected on the second Tuesday of October, instead of the fourth Thursday. It left a very large class of officers still to be elected on the fourth Thursday of October.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with great deference to my colleagues who differ from the majority of the committee, I ask if they will tell this House when the circuit judge is to be elected next year? There is to be a circuit judge elected in 1874. Will they tell the House when the circuit judge is to be elected next year? Is it on the fourth Thursday of October; and if not, what has changed the time of election of the "district officers?"

The House will observe that the new constitution, which only provided that the election of State and county officers and members of the Legislature should be changed to the second Tuesday of October from the fourth Thursday, split that election in two. Now I hope I shall not be misunderstood, and I hope my point will not be overlooked by the advocates of the August election. When are the district officers to be elected in 1874? The code provides that they shall be elected on the fourth Thursday of October. The new constitution declares that the State and county officers shall be elected on the second Tuesday of October, leaving the district officers, to wit, the circuit judges and the Representatives in Congress, to be elected on the fourth Thursday of October, precisely as they were prior to the adoption of the new constitution.

Now, another thing: not only were these old district officers—the circuit judges and the Representatives in Congress—required to be elected on the fourth Thursday of October, but the new constitution created a large number of new district officers. All the officers that were previously denominated township officers are under the new constitution made district officers. Now, when are they to be elected? By express provision of the constitution the justices of the peace and the constables are made district officers.

Now I hope to hear from my colleague from Wisconsin whether these old district officers and these new district officers are to be elected in 1874 on the fourth Thursday of October or at some other day. And if upon the fourth Thursday of October—if the new constitution splits this general election right in two; if, as I assert, the majority of the State officers, counting the district officers, be left under that generic term of district officers to be elected on the fourth Thursday of October, does not the code amply provide for the officers to receive and return the votes? If so, I ask what becomes of the argument of my colleague of the minority, that the code has provided no manner of election, no officers to receive the votes or make the return in case of the congressional election? If the election of a large class of district officers may lawfully be held on the fourth Thursday of October, 1874, apart from the election of State officers, why might not the election of the Representatives in Congress be held in 1872 apart from the State election?

Mr. Speaker, with deference to my colleague and to the distinguished lawyers who I understand are to advocate the August election, I challenge the proof that the election of Representatives in Congress "is hinged upon the State election" any more than the election of State officers is hinged upon the congressional election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time is getting short, and I have not the opportunity to take up and discuss the question as to this August election. Let me call attention to one thing: The Constitution of the United States requires that the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives shall be prescribed. Now, sir, I ask, is the schedule of the constitutional convention of West Virginia, which simply provided that the constitution should be submitted to the ratification or rejection of the people of West Virginia, and that with that constitution there should be submitted also the schedule which provided for the election of State officers—is that schedule, which submitted to a popular vote the question whether they would have an election on that day or not, a "prescription" of the congressional election within the meaning of the Constitution?

Upon this point I call the attention of the House to the old constitution of West Virginia, from which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No convention shall be called having authority to alter the constitution of the State, unless it be in pursuance of a law passed by the affirmative vote of a majority of the members elected to each branch of the Legislature, and providing that polls shall be held throughout the State on some day therein specified, which shall not be less than three months after the passage of such law, for the purpose of taking the sense of the voters on the question of calling a convention. And such convention shall not be held unless a majority of the votes cast at such polls be in favor of calling the same; nor shall members be elected to such convention until at least one month after the result of the polls shall be duly ascertained, declared, and published. And all acts and ordinances of said convention shall be submitted to the voters of the State for ratification or rejection, and shall have no validity whatever until they are ratified; and in no event shall they, by any shift or device, be made to have any retrospective operation or effect.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that by this provision of the old constitution of West Virginia it was explicitly provided that no act or ordinance of that convention should have any retrospective operation or effect. Now, when that convention, restrained as it was by the old constitution, submitted this new constitution and schedule to the people of West Virginia, and this congressional election on the fourth Thursday of August was to be null and void if that constitution was not ratified, I ask in all candor if that was an election which was "prescribed" within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, or in any sense prescribed by valid law?

Now, the answer made to this is, that the analogy of the admission of new States into the Union is sufficient authority for holding this election to have been valid, and upon this question I ask the Clerk to read from Jameson on Constitutional Conventions.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is true that, in many cases, such has been the practice. There being as yet no State, and, of course, no State Legislature, unless the convention could make a temporary arrangement for the election of members of Congress, the new State must, after its admission into the Union, be unrepresented in that body, until a State Legislature could be elected and could pass the necessary laws, a condition involving often a considerable delay. In such cases, accordingly, the custom has been for the convention to anticipate the action of the Legislature, a course which, on account of its obvious convenience, has been commonly acquiesced in. These cases, however, form exceptions to a rule which is general, that it is the State Legislatures which apportion their several States for congressional elections. I have failed to find a single exception to that rule save in the cases of Territories seeking to become States, or of States standing substantially on the same footing as Territories.

Besides, in one view of the subject, such action of the Territories, taken in connection with that of Congress following it, involves no impropriety, if it is not strictly regular. Immediately following that clause of the Federal Constitution giving the power of determining the "times, places, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives" to the State Legislatures, is the important reservation, "but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators." Hence, having the power to make or alter, Congress doubtless might ratify such regulations, however made; or, if a State, actual or inchoate, were in such a condition that it had no lawful Legislature, Congress might itself, for the sake of convenience, establish them by its direct action.

This it does, in substance, by anticipation in those cases in which it accepts and admits into the Union Territories presenting themselves with constitutions containing the apportionments referred to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, obtained the floor.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to develop his view of the case.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I only desire a few minutes more time.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Only ten minutes.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. There is a large number who desire to participate in this discussion.

There was no objection, and the gentleman's time was extended.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this authority of Jameson on Constitutional Conventions be a just review of the question, then these cases of the admission of new States and of the Senators and Representatives from new States are no authority for the admission of the gentlemen elected from West Virginia without a "prescription" of time, under section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution. I call the attention of the House to the fact, that in every case where Senators and Representatives have been admitted simultaneously with the admission of new States they have been elected outside of the Constitution. And upon this point I ask the Clerk to read from the reconstruction laws of March 11, 1868.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the constitutional conventions of any of the States mentioned in the acts to which this is amendatory may provide that at the time of voting upon the ratification of the constitution the registered voters may vote also for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and for all elective officers provided for by the said constitution; and the same election officers who shall make the return of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall enumerate and certify the votes cast for members of Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask whether the gentlemen who assert that these precedents of the admission of Representatives from new States are sufficient authority in this case concede or do not concede that enabling acts like that which has been read at the desk are outside of the Constitution? In the case of the insurrectionary States, that act which has been read authorized the constitutional conventions to prescribe the times for the election of Representatives in Congress. It was not a prescription by the Legislature; it was not a prescription in a State within section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution. They were elections which were held outside of the Constitution. The Representatives elected were admitted to Congress upon the theory (whether it is right or wrong is not a question for discussion now) that a State is not fully in the Union until it is in its normal and constitutional relations with the Union and represented in Congress.

Of course these precedents cannot be cited as authority for the election of Representatives in a State within the Union, where the constitution is in full sway. If Congress has the power, by enabling acts outside of the Constitution, to authorize a constitutional convention to provide for an election of Representatives in Congress in a Territory, Congress may ratify that election, and with the admission of the State may admit these members into Congress. But that admission has no force and is of no authority in the case of a State which is in the Union and where the constitution has full sway, as it had in West Virginia.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had rejected the bill of the House (H. R. No. 131) for the relief of John Colter.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden; and

A bill (S. No. 85) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1799; and also of the act entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

WEST VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the West Virginia contested-election cases.

[Mr. HAZELTON, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that this debate cannot be finished to-night, and as the time for adjournment is near at hand, I will, if it be entirely agreeable to the gentleman, ask that he give way for a motion to take a recess. There has been a session ordered for this evening.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I have no wish in the premises; I am entirely willing the House should do as it desires upon the matter.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Had not the gentleman better finish his speech this afternoon?

Mr. SPEER. We ought not to adjourn now. There are so many gentlemen wishing to speak on this question that, unless the gentleman from Wisconsin prefers it, I hope the House will refuse to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Last week the House ordered that on Wednesday and Thursday evenings of each week, at half-past seven o'clock, there should be sessions to consider the consolidated statutes of the United States, as reported by the Committee on Revision of the Laws. During the consideration of that subject the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The motion of Mr. HALE, of New York, was agreed to; there being—ayes 90, noes 55; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till half-past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening for the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, the general purpose of the committee is very well shown by the title they have agreed upon for this revision. I will take no time to go into the history of this matter. It is known to every gentleman on this floor that for three years we had three commissioners at work revising the statutes of the United States. The very great need of this revision had long been felt, especially by the legal profession. The statutes of the United States have never been heretofore revised. Every general law that has ever been passed, from the foundation of the Government down to the present time, is now found upon the statute books; and all the recent volumes contain not only all the general laws, but also annual appropriation bills and all the private bills.

Our statutes had fallen into such a state of almost inextricable confusion that for many years—had it not been for the digests prepared by private men—Brightly's Digest and Abbott's Digest—it would have been almost impossible for any one to ascertain from the statutes what the law was upon any particular subject. These commissioners had three years in which to complete their work. The time expired early in May last. Under the act by which these commissioners were appointed they were authorized to make changes in the law, to a certain extent, for the purpose of harmonizing the provisions of the statutes, of which liberty they availed themselves to some extent, but probably not to any greater extent than by the law they were warranted in doing.

For instance, in nearly every law that has been passed establishing a new judicial district, there would be a variety of provisions applicable to the district court of that district; and where the district court was invested with certain powers, there would be a variety of provisions applicable to that district alone, both to their district and circuit courts. And in all the territorial bills that have been passed there would be a variety of provisions in relation to one Territory differing to some extent from those relating to the other Territories.

The commissioners, in both instances, undertook to make the law uniform, as far as they could, in relation to these two subjects, and in various other particulars that I will not take time to name.

When the committee came to examine the work they became satisfied that it was utterly impossible to carry this work through Congress in the limited time that is allowed here for the examination of any given subject; that it would be utterly impossible to undertake to carry the work through and have it adopted by Congress if it were understood to contain any new legislation at all. Therefore, under a special act that was passed on the last day of the last Congress the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, under the authority of that act, employed Mr. Durant, a lawyer of this city, to take this work and go over it and expunge from it everything in the nature of change; anything that altered the law in any particular from what it stood upon the statute-book. Mr. Durant went over the work for that purpose, and also arranged it in form to be presented as a bill before the House.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. Is this the book as revised by Mr. Durant, or is there a separate report?

Mr. POLAND. That is the volume as revised by Mr. Durant.

Mr. BECK. Thank you.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does that include all? Has he gone through the whole of it?

Mr. POLAND. This volume includes all of the general statutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are three volumes here.

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir; one of them embraces the postal routes merely, and another Indian treaties. This single volume embraces all the general statutes. I think some people have perhaps fallen into an error by examining a report that was made by Mr. Durant stating in detail the various alterations that he had made of the commissioners' work, from which many understood that the commissioners' work was very full of errors and very imperfectly done; but by a comparison of the work of the commissioners with this report of Mr. Durant it will be obvious that nearly all of these changes that have been made are cases where he has struck out something which the commissioners had put in and noted as a change of the law. It shows what he did in carrying out the instructions of the committee in divesting the work of any change.

As I said, the committee came to the conclusion that it would be impossible to attempt to carry this through Congress with any new legislation in it; that every section of it must be scrutinized and examined, and such a length of time would be required that it would be impossible to do it. And therefore we have, by the aid of Mr. Durant and by our own efforts in examining it, endeavored to make this a perfect reflex of the statutes as they stand; and for that reason the committee have indicated this in the title we have adopted and placed on the work: "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, 1873," which was the first day of this session.

There are various reasons why this was a convenient, a very convenient, arrangement; and it has not often happened that any single volume of the Statutes has terminated with a Congress at all. All the legislation of the last Congress is contained in the last volume of the Statutes; so that by bringing this work up to the 1st of December we include in it all the legislation of last Congress and all that is contained in the seventeen bound volumes of the Statutes. If we were to pass this at the end of the session, why then, of course, the daily legislation of Congress would have to be woven into it in order to make it perfect. But by making this merely a compilation and revision of the statutes in force up to the beginning of this session, and adopting it in that form, the law as we pass it and leave it in this book remains to be changed and is changed by any legislation that may be passed by this Congress.

I have no doubt every gentleman upon this floor feels the same anxiety as I do, and that all the members of the committee feel, that this work should be carried through successfully, and that we shall have the aid of every gentleman upon this floor for that purpose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is this volume supposed to contain all the acts of Congress now in force?

Mr. POLAND. All the general acts.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Of a permanent character.

Mr. BECK. I want to call attention to one fact. I listened to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] while he announced that what the commissioners had formerly done in the way of changing the law had been stricken out by Mr. Durant, and that the object was to allow the law to remain just as it was. My attention was called some time ago to a clause of the statutes, and I find that in reference to it the law is changed, not by mistake, not by leaving it out, but that evidently it has been changed intentionally. I will give this one specimen which will be among the very first things to be considered. Perhaps we cannot reach it to-night. The old judiciary act of 1789 required, among other things, in these words:

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature in person or in writing, as he may be required, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office; and generally shall perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform.

The Revision of the Statutes, page 57, section 251, is a literal transcript, word for word, showing it was copied, and it has left out the words "in person or," and the words "as he may be required." That is done, not by oversight, for every other word is copied, but is a direct attempt on the part of the reviser to prevent the House bringing the Secretary of the Treasury here to give an account of his office, as prescribed by law. I wish to know why that was done?

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, of course that the committee and Mr. Durant have succeeded in eliminating every change which was made I do not suppose to be true. I have found in that portion of the work which I have examined some need of amendment in my judgment and the judgment of the committee to make it perfect. And here is a good opportunity for me to say what I have once before said on this subject, but probably was not heard. The committee desire every member of this House, they desire everybody, whether a member of this House or not, who has any suggestion in reference to any change which is required to make this an exact and perfect reflex of the existing statutes, to bring that to the notice of the committee, that we may compare it with the statutes and see whether there is any error or not. In reference to this particular one, that portion of the revision was not my particular province to examine as a member of the committee, and therefore that had not fallen within my observation. I suppose the gentleman who has that in charge, if he discovers it, will report it to the committee, and I am glad my friend has called attention to it.

Mr. BECK. The reason I called attention to it is that it is perfectly obvious it was left out on purpose; that it is not a mistake. It cannot be a mistake; for every word of the section is copied, and the words to which I have referred are purposely left out, thus changing the law. Therefore it is, I think, this House will have to be very careful if that is the fact. I can see how mistakes will creep in; but when Mr. Durant or anybody else leaves out words, evidently on purpose, then it becomes another and a different thing.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Whose particular attention ought to have been called to that suggestion? The gentleman from Vermont says this did not come under his consideration. Who of the committee ought to have examined it?

Mr. POLAND. The committee's amendments are not yet in.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to know, so that I may address a question to the member of the committee having this particular thing in charge, to see whether it was left out by design or accident.

Mr. POLAND. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, but what Mr. Durant copied this section from the work of the commissioners without himself noticing that they made any change in the law in this particular.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The question I suggest either he does not desire to answer or else he has not comprehended it. What I wish to know is this: We have the information from the gentleman from Vermont that this does not come under his observation and consideration; I therefore conclude it was given out in parcels to the several members of the committee; and while the gentleman has given us the negative fact that he is not the gentleman who examined it, I ask him who did—whose particular attention ought to have been called to it?

Mr. POLAND. The committee have not made any amendments yet.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I see the gentleman does not desire to answer me.

Mr. POLAND. If it is important to my friend to know what gentleman of the committee, as a sub-committee, had this portion of the work, I tell him my friend and colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] was intrusted with this part.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The reason I wish to know is that I may address an inquiry to him whether his attention had been called to this, and whether these words were left out by design or accident, because I suppose we shall be very much admonished to give this a closer scrutiny, if we find the committee have acted in concert with Mr. Durant in leaving out so important a provision as the one suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky.

If the matter has been candidly and fairly examined by the committee, and they upon their honor as gentlemen of the committee will say to the House that they know there are no changes, or that they know of none, we would give a great deal more confidence to that statement than we would if we find such errors that seem to have been designedly made.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] will allow me, I will state that which perhaps will relieve the mind of my friend on my left, [Mr. ELDREDGE.] This inquiry points to something which seems to me to be essential to the completion of our work. I agree with his idea and with his expression of it. I do not know that there is any harm in saying, very frankly, that I have not quite got to that section yet. The amount of labor required to go over this work, section by section, and compare it with the laws as they are, in order that we may have personal knowledge, and be prepared to state to the House that we know or believe that there is no change in the law as it stands—the amount of that labor is enormous, as perhaps the gentleman may be aware.

I stated to the House the other day, when this assignment was made, that during the recess, intending to devote all the time I could spare to it, I sat down on the first day, as soon as I had eaten my breakfast, and spent my time until it was dark at night without intermission, and had then gone over two pages. I have since gone on somewhat faster by obtaining some assistance—a reader.

But as we considered that this ought to be brought before the House as soon as possible, having in view the length of time it would take, when our committee was called we proposed to begin, as the committee was far enough advanced to take up as much of the time as the House would devote to it on one or two evenings, proposing to keep up with the work so as to be able to answer questions as the work proceeds.

Now, to come right to the point of the gentleman's inquiry. I believe as to the first fifty pages of this volume I can answer any questions that can be asked. I hope every member of the House, so far as he is willing to give his time to the matter, will go over it; and that any one who is interested in any particular inquiry, instead of bringing it up in the House in the first instance, will bring it to the notice of the chairman of the committee, or of the member of the committee having it more especially in charge. In my opinion, with my ideas of the extent of human memory, it is physically impossible that in regard to statutes enacted seventy-five years ago, when there may be found a clause that is not found in this volume, to at once answer whether or not there has since been some change in the law which has altered it, and which is the reason for its being left out.

I can only say that in one or two instances in which I could not find why certain things were left out, on applying to the commissioner or to Mr. Durant I found that they were in another part of the book which had not been assigned to me for consideration. I made a list of quite a number of matters that I supposed would come up in that connection. I can only say to the House that so far as we go—and we make the statement to the House—they may rely that there is not known to the committee a change of a syllable or of a comma of the statutes so as to change their effect. We have put ourselves before the House upon this proposition, on which we invite the co-operation of every member of the House: that this volume of laws as the House shall pass it, section by section, shall contain the law as it stood on the first day of the session of Congress.

Mr. ELDREDGE. One word further in this connection. The gentleman will believe that I intended to cast no imputation or reproach on the committee.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I did not so take it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. On the contrary, it was the very magnitude and greatness of the work to which the gentleman has referred that led me to make the inquiry which I did. I know it is impossible for any committee of this House, or for the Committee of the Whole, to go through and examine this volume as it is read by the Clerk, however devoted they may be to the work, however much time they may spend in its examination. On account of its magnitude it is impossible that we should give it all the care and careful scrutiny that it should receive.

The faith and credit which I may be inclined to give to the report of the committee would depend somewhat upon the answer to the question which I suggested. If the committee have had time, as I know they have the ability, to make their examination so complete as to be able to say there are no changes in any particular clause or section or chapter which may be under consideration, that would go very far with me to satisfy me in taking their word upon the matter and letting this revision go without further examination. But if this be not the case—if the reviser, who is not before the House, whose honor is not perhaps pledged to the House on such a statement as has been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] and also the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND]—we would not be willing, I suppose, and we would not be justified, in taking the statement of the reviser to the same extent we would that of the gentlemen of the committee. It was with this view, and this alone, that I followed up the inquiry suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. Let me say one word further to put myself right. I do not want the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to misunderstand me. I have never been able to get hold of this book until to-day. I have tried to buy it, to borrow it, to beg it. I begged the chairman for a copy, and for two weeks he kept assuring me that he would send it to my room.

Mr. POLAND. Let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that before the recess I caused a copy of this book for every member of the House to be placed in the post-office to be sent out.

Mr. BECK. I managed to borrow a copy of the book this afternoon.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I can say the same thing that the gentleman from Kentucky does. This is the first time I have ever seen the report of the committee, although I have made several efforts to get it. I supposed, however, that my case was singular, because I was absent during the recess for some twenty days, and I thought that probably the book had been sent to me and had failed to reach me because of my absence.

Mr. POLAND. I did the best I could, unless I had gone in person and delivered the book.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I did not expect the gentleman to follow me to New Orleans and present me with a volume. But I will say that gentlemen all around me (few as there are here) are in the same situation—have never received the report and did not know it had ever been sent to them. I think members generally are in the same situation.

Mr. BECK. The reason I called attention to the omission of the particular provision to which I have referred is that I did not know until within a few months that that was the law; I had disputed the question with some gentlemen, who held that we could bring the Secretary of the Treasury before Congress to examine him. I found that such was the law. Hence to-day I naturally turned to see how this matter stood in this revision, and seeing that the provision had been omitted, and that it came as early as the fifty-seventh page, and seeing that it had probably been omitted under the first idea of the commissioners, to omit in the codification the laws that were obsolete, and that Mr. Durant had failed to observe the omission and restore the provision—observing that the omission in the first instance was not accidental, I thought it proper to call attention to it, so that we might settle the point whether in this proceeding we are merely to declare the law as it is without change.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman must be aware that in dividing up so large a work as this among the members of the committee, no one of them can be supposed to have gone over and examined carefully all that portion of the work that was allotted to him. We expect to proceed with our examination, to make report, and have it considered, as fast as we shall ask the House to act upon it.

I have spent the whole time since this session began in this work, occupying every day upon the matter during the entire vacation, and I have not been able to complete that portion of the work that I took for my personal examination. Thus it may be that there are some portions of the work which no member of the committee has yet examined or upon which he can now answer questions. But as fast as the different provisions are read and presented to the House some member of the committee will, I trust, be able to answer any question that any gentleman chooses to ask.

I yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is a part of the history of our early legislation that the act organizing the Treasury Department was drawn up by Alexander Hamilton. He was a gentleman highly gifted with powers of speech, and, being somewhat an admirer of the forms and practices of the English government, he introduced into the act organizing the Treasury Department a provision that the Secretary of the Treasury might come before the House at its request to make any statements of importance which might be required in explanation of his branch of the service. The act organizing the State Department was drawn up by Thomas Jefferson, and, as he was not gifted with talents for public speaking, he did not insert any such provision in the act organizing the State Department. So also the other Departments were organized without any such provision.

Now my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] and my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] as I understand, suppose that in this revision Mr. Durant has purposely omitted those words of the statute under which the Secretary of the Treasury might be required to come before the House. On this point they are mistaken. The provision of Mr. Durant's revision on this subject will be found on page 57 and in section 251. It is undoubtedly true that the section as found on that page does omit the words which would require the Secretary of the Treasury to come before the House; but if gentlemen will turn to the second page of errata in the early part of the volume they will find that the omission is a typographical error, and is corrected in the second table of errata.

Mr. BECK. There is no second table of errata in my book.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir; it is here. I will read the correction as it is found in this table of errata:

On page 57, section 251, line 10, after the word "legislature," insert the words "in person or," and after the words "in writing" insert "as may be required."

Mr. BECK. Now, sir, there are no additional errata in mine.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are additional errata in mine.

Mr. BECK. They are not in mine.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let me see the gentleman's copy. There is a sheet left out in the gentleman's copy. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I have examined one hundred and seventy-five pages of this book, and so far as I am capable of judging it has been executed with wonderful accuracy. I do not say it is absolutely perfect, for absolute perfection in a work of this kind is entirely impossible; but I do say that in my judgment this revision has reached as near perfection as human skill can make it.

Mr. POLAND. I ask the Clerk to read——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment of the bill. Unless other order is made by the House, the Chair will direct the several chapters of the bill to be read by their titles.

Mr. POLAND. I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, the first question will be on the adoption of this title which the committee has submitted.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill No. 1215, to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, this volume, which he says contains the whole thing, has no title whatever.

Mr. POLAND. The committee move this title.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is not in this volume.

Mr. POLAND. It is our first amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does it come under another erratum? I think the title had better be deferred until we get through with this bill. The title is the last thing in order in legislation.

Mr. POLAND. We desire to establish in the first place that this was not a work where there was to be new legislation.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We ought to have the babe before we christen it. [Laughter.]

Mr. POLAND. We propose this for the purpose of having the action of the House that this is not to be the basis of any new legislation, and, if the gentleman will allow me to say, we have been pestered by all sorts of people. A gentleman has sent me a book of one hundred pages, proposing at least one thousand amendments to the tariff law, which he insisted it was the duty of the Committee on Revision to put in, because they are good amendments. The committee determined in the outset on that basis recommending the adoption of this title, so that it may be understood it is not a work on which any legislation is to be hung by anybody.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But suppose before the House gets through with the work we should differ with the committee who reported the bill, and suppose we should put upon it some additional sections, then this name which the gentleman would give to the law, would be an improper one.

Mr. POLAND. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, and every other good sensible man on the floor, to put a stop to anything of that sort by adopting this title.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not see how that would be. I do not think it would prohibit the House going on independently to take different action if we adopt any title of this sort. It is not usual to adopt a title to an act of this magnitude until the act itself has been amended and completed so that the proper name can be applied to it. I believe it is contrary to the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The understanding of the Chair is, that the bill has had several readings by its title without objection. The title which has been just reported by the committee is the title read to the House on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order, whether, under the rules of the House, we would have an opportunity to change the title after the bill is finished?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will complete his statement, with the leave of the gentleman from Wisconsin. This stands as the title of the bill unless a motion be made to amend it. It will be in order after the adoption of the bill, with or without amendment, as the case may be, to amend the title. This now stands as the title of the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But supposing the committee should now act upon it and determine this title, which has been read, to be the title, would they afterward have the power, after it had been passed and thus acted upon, to amend it? It seems to me not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is not in session as a Committee of the Whole, but is in session as the House in execution of a special order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then the difficulty would be equally great, if not greater.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that there is any difficulty. The Chair agrees to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that any motion to amend the title comes after the disposition of the remainder of the bill. Frequently the question is put in legislative bodies after the adoption of a bill, "Shall this stand as the title of the bill?" In the House, ordinarily, that question is not distinctly put, but the title stands unless a test motion is made for its amendment. No such motion is in order at the present time. But the bill has passed two several readings already by its title, and without objection. The title which has been reported from the committee was read to the House as the title of the bill, and that stands as the title of the bill, as it has passed two several readings, unless, after the bill itself is disposed of, the House shall otherwise order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think the Chair is correct in that view. That is the opinion I hold.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Although, for the purposes of the first two readings, the title proposed by the committee stands as the title of the bill, subject to any amendment the House may hereafter make.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The following section was read:

SEC. 3. The word "vessel" includes every description of water-craft or other artificial contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water. It also includes every utensil for holding liquid or other substances.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out from section 3 the last sentence, which is not found, to the best of my knowledge and belief—and that is all I can state to the House on these matters—in any statute of the United States, and is an attempt to enact a part of the dictionary. In justice to the revisers of the statutes and the gentlemen employed to review their work, I should say that the ground of their putting in that clause was that in several of the acts——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts will send his amendment in writing to the desk.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 3 and 4 of section 3 these words: "It also includes every utensil for holding liquid and other substances."

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The first part of this section, giving the definition to vessels used for navigation, is found in a statute in force at the present time. In several acts relating to the internal revenue the word "vessel" is used in a sense which, obviously, is not comprised in the statutory definition, and from its context it is very obvious what its meaning is. But there has been no statute of the United States declaring that it shall include that other definition. The committee were of opinion that it therefore was not advisable, and did not come within the rule they prescribed to themselves, to insert it in the statutes. There would of course have been no difficulty in giving that word a suitable construction whenever it was met with in those statutes.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the word "vessel" in the first line of this section. I make the motion for the purpose of obtaining some information from the gentlemen who have charge of this work in regard to the definition of "vessel."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will send his amendment in writing to the desk.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the word "vessel." I follow the precedent which the Chair permitted to the gentleman before me, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

I find that by this section

The word "vessel" includes every description of water-craft or other artificial contrivance used, or capable of being used, as a means of transportation on water.

Now, if the laws of the United States as they exist now have that definition and can bear it, it is a very singular anomaly. There is upon our rivers and lakes an immense transportation of such material as is carried in vessels. I have in my thought now lumber, more particularly, which is carried hundreds of miles and in quantities of millions of feet in rafts. A raft of logs is itself transported in that way, filled with lumber. Now, this definition makes a raft or logs of lumber in process of transportation a vessel, and there are general laws which make a vessel subject to certain duties.

There are on our waters a large number of artificial contrivances which have no possible resemblance to a vessel in build, or make, or in use, except that they are capable of floating themselves and sustaining an additional weight of other material upon them when afloat. Now, I do not know but the present laws of the United States make every artificial contrivance a vessel in the technical sense. And there are other laws which define certain duties in regard to vessels, in regard to their registry, in regard to their purchase, and in regard to their ownership by citizens of the United States or by foreigners. I do not know that the laws of the United States would make all such articles "vessels," but I very much doubt——

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If the gentleman is seeking information, I will say to him, as I thought I had said before, that those words from which he proposes to strike the word "vessel" are copied word for word from a recent act of the United States in the statutes now in force which gives it a definition, and the law as it stands permits that definition. If the gentleman doubts it, I can only remove his doubts by recommending him to look at that act.

Mr. CONGER. That may be so. I do not doubt the gentleman's word, and I am very happy to learn that it is a recent statute, for I venture to say that the fathers, who knew something about the compiling of laws, would not have made a statute containing any such definition. This is a statute of modern date, a recent statute. That such a definition as this should enter into the body of this law, or of any old law, would, to a practical mind, seem to be absurd.

Mr. POLAND. This precise language is found in the statute of July 8, 1866, Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 178; the very identical words contained in the section under consideration.

Mr. CONGER. When I call attention to this general proposition, that everywhere in the laws of the United States the word "vessel" includes every description of water-craft or artificial contrivance, I am met by the statute which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] hands me. Now, in that statute the word "vessel" is used in this sense: "That for the purpose of this act the term 'vessel' whenever hereinafter used shall be held to include every description of water-craft." This is an act especially in regard to vessels; vessels for enrollment, for tonnage, to carry goods to foreign countries, engaged in the coasting trade. Now for the purposes of that act—I wish I had time to read it through, but I have not—this definition of the word "vessel" may be very correct. But I submit that that does not answer my objection to this section, which is, that a general definition of a word running through all the statutes of the United States, in the very first chapter of the compiled laws, declaring that a "vessel," whenever referred to in the law thereafter, is "any artificial contrivance used or capable of being used as a means of transportation on water"—such a definition cannot be found in our laws; at least I hope it cannot be found there. Certainly it ought not to be found in the first chapter of the compiled laws. I made the motion to amend, in order to call the attention of gentlemen to the use of that word here, and I may say to its ridiculous use here. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read section 20.

The succeeding four sections were as follows:

SEC. 21. When a decennial enumeration of the inhabitants of the several States, under the Constitution, is completed and returned to the Secretary of the Interior, he shall compute a reapportionment of the whole number of Representatives among the States, in the following manner:

First. He shall ascertain the aggregate population entitled to representation by counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

Second. He shall divide this aggregate population by the number of Representatives of which the House shall then be composed by law, and the quotient, rejecting any fraction of a unit, if any remains, shall be the ratio of apportionment of Representatives among the several States under that census.

Third. He shall then proceed to ascertain the representative population of each State by counting the whole number of persons therein, excluding Indians not taxed, and to divide it by the ratio determined as above directed; and the quotient shall be the number of Representatives apportioned to such State under that census.

SEC. 22. In making the computation directed in the preceding section, the deficiency in the number of members caused by the fractions remaining in the several States shall be compensated by assigning an additional member to each of so many States having the largest fractions as will make the whole number of Representatives two hundred and ninety-two, with the addition of one Representative for each State hereafter admitted.

SEC. 23. Whenever a new State is admitted to the Union, the Representatives assigned to it shall be, until the apportionment made under the next census, and no longer, in addition to the number two hundred and ninety-two.

SEC. 24. When the Secretary of the Interior has apportioned the Representatives among the several States under any future census, he shall make out and transmit, under the seal of his office, to the House of Representatives, a certificate of the number of Representatives apportioned to each State; and he shall make out and transmit to the executive of each State a certificate, under seal, of the number of Representatives apportioned to such State.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It may not be necessary to read at length the next four sections. I will state that the Committee on Revision of the Laws propose to strike out all of sections 21, 22, and 24, and from section 23 the words, "until the apportionment made under the next census, and no longer." The committee were of the opinion that the statute establishing the present number of the House of Representatives has repealed entirely the provisions of the law which imposed on the Secretary of the Interior the duty of making a new apportionment of the House after each census, under the former ratio of representation. That provision is no longer in force, and should not appear in this revision. I found, on consulting the commissioners, that they were inclined to think so. I believe every one whose attention has been called to the subject has come to that conclusion upon examination. Those provisions of the former statutes provided that the Secretary of the Interior should make the basis of his computation upon the number two hundred and thirty-three, as the number of the House of Representatives, and not upon the additional number now provided. The provisions are so inconsistent, the provision of the last law is so absolute and distinct, without any qualification as to time, that the House of Representatives shall consist of the number of which it is now composed, that it seemed to us that no one could doubt that that was intended to stand for the law, and to cover the whole subject until some future legislation should be had.

The amendment moved by Mr. E. R. HOAR was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

SEC. 30. All votes for Representatives in Congress must be by written or printed ballot; and all votes received or recorded contrary to this section shall be of no effect. But this section shall not apply to any State voting otherwise, whose election for Representatives occurs previous to the regular meeting of its Legislature next after the 28th day of February, 1871.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would call the attention of the Committee on Revision of the Laws to the last clause of the section just read.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The committee have considered that clause, and were at first inclined to think that it had become obsolete, that the cause for the statute had passed, and that nothing could arise under it; but they did not feel so sure, without looking into the election laws of the States, that there might not be some election in reference to which a petition to this House might not arise in regard to the validity of the election of a member; and as it stands in the law unrepealed, as it was a qualification of the law as it passed, the committee did not feel that they could say to the House that this provision was certainly obsolete. Of course it does no harm to let it stand as it is. We are on the safe side of endeavoring to preserve the law, unless we could find it had been changed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does not this section relieve any such State, if there be any such, from the requirement to have written or printed ballots, and allow the people of that State to vote without written or printed ballots?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The gentleman is diverging into what I thought he was joining us in preventing if possible. That is the language of the law as it stands in the statute book at this moment.

If members of the House inquire from time to time whether a certain piece of legislation is not capable of a very mischievous or very foolish construction, or whether it expresses what the law should be, the committee might agree with them in saying that it had better be amended; that the intent of the law might be better carried out by changing the language. But the House was cautioned the other day most solemnly by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] that any attempt to make the law clearer by something which any two minds might think made a change in it, was not to be allowed, except at the peril of opening the whole statutes of the United States on all subjects to indefinite amendment. Hence the committee thought that the language of this section, which is the language of the original law, must stand in the statutes, to be expounded in this revision as it would be expounded in the statute originally passed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I submit, then, to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he has subjected himself already to the frowns and opposition of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means by the amendment he proposed to the third section of chapter 1, where an amendment was made striking out a portion of the language, and also in the amendment striking out several sections.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The gentleman will allow me to say that he is obviously in error.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman has not heard my whole statement.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The words the gentleman refers to as having been struck out were not found in any statute of the United States. There was no law enacting that a vessel should include what was there declared. Those words were put in as being derived, in the opinion of the reviser, from certain statutes in which no such provision was made. We struck out the language, so as not to have a particle of alteration.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then, by striking out the several sections on pages 5 and 6 the committee have certainly come under the condemnation of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Those were struck out because we found them to have been repealed by an act subsequently passed. I do not see, therefore, that the condemnation applies. We are trying as carefully as we possibly can to avoid any changes in existing law.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I understand the committee to take this position, that however absurd a provision may have crept into the existing law, it is not the purpose of the committee to even correct such a thing.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Exactly. We thought it impossible to go through with this work if we departed from that rule.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be a great deal better to employ an accurate clerk to go through the statutes and do this work than to have the House engage upon it. I think that one or two good clerks would do this work a good deal better than the House of Representatives, or, perhaps, even the gentlemen of the committee can. If the work is a mere clerical one we are here to very little purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 41. Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress, whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 34, may receive their compensation monthly, from the beginning of their term until the beginning of the first session of each Congress, upon a certificate in the form now in use to be signed by the Clerk of the House, which certificate shall have the like force and effect as is given to the certificate of the Speaker; but, in case the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be notified that the election of any such holder of a certificate of election will be contested, his name shall not be placed upon the roll of members-elect so as to entitle him to be paid, until he shall have been sworn in as a member, or until such contest shall be determined.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call the attention of the committee having this bill in charge to the fact that we come here to a section which refers to section 34. The fact that two or three sections have been struck out will of course change the numbering of the sections all the way through.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The whole numbering must be changed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Some provision should be made for changing the numbering contained in the body of the section referred to. I do not know what course the committee will suggest for settling this matter. This section 41 refers to a section 34, which will have some other number.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That matter has attracted the attention of the committee. When reference is made in this revision to any section by number, it obviously means the section as numbered in this printed copy. When the whole work has been gone through with, the sections left standing will all have to be renumbered, and the references from one to another will all have to be corrected. It would probably be impossible to make the corrections as we go on.

Mr. HALE, of New York. For that purpose I suggest that the House now have a unanimous understanding that clerical corrections of that kind which may become necessary may be made without the necessity of formal amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposes that any amendments of that nature which may be required will be in order at the end of the bill.

Mr. POLAND. It will be impossible to determine, before we get through, the number of any particular section, because various sections will be struck out and various others inserted, so that the numbering of all the sections will have to be changed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And the references changed accordingly.

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I only wish now to call attention to the matter so that it may be provided for in some way.

Mr. MYERS. While this codification of the laws is intended in no wise to alter the existing statutes, but to gather them together in such a manner that they may be best understood, some such latitude as that just spoken of must be allowed. We may find it necessary to make corrections in the printing of the old law—particularly errors of punctuation.

Just here, while I have the chance, I take the liberty of referring to an error which, in my opinion, loses to the Government half a million dollars annually. The illustration will serve to point out the necessity for carefully watching this bill by those most interested in the various subjects to which it refers.

On page 619—and I propose to refer to it now, as it illustrates the point; and if I feel enough interest to do that, I commend that interest to others who feel equal interest in other sections and in reference to other matters—in line 206, on the free list, I find "fruits, plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation." On page 605, lines 1054 to 1062, I find "fruits," designating them, at a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem. Turning to the Congressional Globe, I find that when dried fruits were attempted to be placed on the free-list, on motion of Mr. WALLS, of Florida, that was struck out. The list as at present printed does not put fruits, but the word "fruit" is put there and a comma placed after it in the law. The committee, when they reach that page and line, will find, if they follow the old law out, they have "fruit" and a comma, "plants, tropical or semi-tropical." Fruits were 20 per cent. ad valorem, and what we placed on the free list were "fruit-plants"—no comma—"tropical and semi-tropical for the purpose of propagation or cultivation." Some one shrewdly went to the Treasury Department and claimed under this section that fruits were free, and had a refund of $150,000; and merely because of the insertion of a comma we will lose half a million of dollars to the Government of the United States in revenue, beside the protection intended to be afforded by the preceding section. I take it when we reach that section we can, by reference to the page and by the preceding section, ascertain that no comma should be there; that it should be "fruit-plants;" that it would otherwise be contradictory to the preceding sections of the law. And the letter "s" put in there is incorrect; but that does not alter it.

And while we are patriotically voting appropriations for the centennial, and for other purposes, let us, while trying to retrench wherever we can, see to it that no errors of this kind shall creep into this codification so as to lose revenue to the Government.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire simply to say on this matter that all has been examined with great care by the Treasury Department. They have come to a decision through the law officer of the Government. The case has been tried in court, where the matter was decided. The law was decided by the judges of the court to be exactly as it stands. The matter was called to my attention, and I was in the habit of going through the revision to see how it stands compared to the law. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] will remember that a bill is already before the Committee on Ways and Means to correct that. He will also remember that commas are no part of law—punctuation does not belong to law. If he will pardon me a moment, all bills in the British Parliament were passed by reading and never had any punctuation, because you could not hear a comma when it was read; and therefore they were all read and engrossed without commas and without punctuation.

Mr. MYERS. Does my friend mean to say when we are now passing on our own laws we are not a court for ourselves?

Mr. POLAND. It seems to me this discussion is not pertinent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This is the law, and we cannot correct it now.

Mr. MYERS. It is not the law, and I shall propose at the proper time to make the correction.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say, then, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just taken his seat, that this is a question which has been called to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee by reason of a semicolon. The Committee on Ways and Means have examined all the bills relative to fruit. We have had to send to the State Department to see how it was exactly. The construction of the Treasury is going to depend on a semicolon.

Mr. MYERS. In this case it depends on a comma.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of New York. With the permission of the House I should like to go back to two sections which have already been read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the following sections:

SEC. 46. No Member or Delegate is entitled to any newspapers.

SEC. 47. No compensation or allowance shall now, or hereafter, be made to Senators, Representatives, or Delegates on account of postage.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to ask the committee if there is any existing statute containing the provision in section 46, or whether that is not a conclusion derived by the compilers from the repeal of a former allowance? If so, it seems to me it ought not to be formally enacted as a section here, particularly in the language we are giving which may imply that the reading of newspapers by members of Congress was to be unlawful. [A laugh.]

I certainly have no knowledge of any such statute as that contained in this section, but suppose it to be merely this, that under a former statute—it must have been a statute, I take it—there was a certain allowance for newspapers and stationery to members. That statute was repealed by the act of March 3, 1873. But I do not understand that the act of March 3, or any other act, ever contained these words.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If my friend will allow me I will explain that according to my recollection—I cannot absolutely state the fact, though I have a very strong belief that it is so—I know it was found somewhere, and I have a strong impression that in an appropriation bill there was put in, following former provisions for allowances for newspapers, an enactment that no member should be entitled to any newspaper; and that is the phraseology adopted.

Mr. POLAND. The act of February 12, 1868, had this provision, that from and after the 3d day of March, 1868—

No Senator or Representative shall receive any newspapers except the Congressional Globe, or stationery, or commutation therefor exceeding $125, for any one session of Congress.

And by an act that was in force on the 1st day of December, 1873, that allowance had been taken away.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That is precisely as I supposed. In other words, this revision inserts a section not found in any existing law, but which embodies a conclusion of the compilers in regard to the present condition of the law derived merely from the repeal of a former statute. Now it appears to me that such sections ought not to stand. I would, therefore, move to strike out the forty-sixth section.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Better move to strike out the forty-sixth and forty-seventh sections.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Yes, sir; the forty-seventh section stands on precisely the same footing. I include that in my motion.

The question being put, it was declared by the Chair to be carried in the affirmative.

Mr. CONGER. I rose to make an inquiry before the question was put. I draw the attention of the committee to this point, that if these sections are stricken out each House may, by resolution, out of its contingent fund, provide postage for members. There will be no law prohibiting it. I think if we leave the matter in that condition it would be wrong to strike out the section.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, has the vote been taken on the motion to strike out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will consider the vote as not having been taken, as there was no negative vote.

Mr. CONGER. My inquiry was if there were no provision of law at all on the subject forbidding any allowance for postage, whether the House or Senate, by its resolution, might not provide for the payment of members from its contingent fund, or in some other way, as they provide for some other contingent expenses. Of course if this section remains, such a resolution would be a violation of it.

Mr. POLAND. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be better to leave these sections to stand. The act of 1868 provided that no Senator or Representative shall receive any newspaper or stationery, or commutation therefor exceeding $125 for any one session of Congress. By the act of last March this allowance was taken away. It seems to me that the residue of this is left in force. It must be considered that we have now a law forbidding any allowance to members of Congress for this. I think the section would be improved by making it read—

No Member or Delegate is entitled to any allowance for newspapers.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me call attention to the language of section 48:

The compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, as prescribed in section 38, shall be in lieu of all pay and allowances.

Now does not that exclude it as completely as it is possible to do it by the multiplication of these clauses which I propose to strike out?

Mr. CONGER. That law has been repealed and the former law restored, so that now the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates is in addition to allowances for mileage, &c.

Mr. POLAND. I think the safe way would be to leave it as it is. But I would propose to amend section 46 by inserting after the word "any" the words "allowance for," so that it will read:

No Member or Delegate is entitled to have any allowance for newspapers.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman from Vermont allow me to inquire whether those sections, including section 48, are not repealed by the recent act of Congress?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then why keep them here at all?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. For the reason that it is impossible to incorporate new provisions of law which may extend over a period of several months of current legislation; and it is proposed to enact this as the law which existed on the first day of this session, subject of course to all subsequent legislation, as it will be subject to the subsequent legislation of future years. We are attempting to fix the law as it was on the first day of this session.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is the time at which it is limited by the act itself.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The proposed title to which the gentleman objected was intended to show that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I was not aware, until I got the information from the gentleman just now, that the title did limit the provisions of the bill itself; perhaps it does.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Allow me to make a single remark.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will withdraw my motion to strike out.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew the motion to strike out. It seems to me that these provisions are very incongruous, especially as we are aware, now, of the change that has taken place. Why put in a conclusion drawn from statutes which have been repealed? It seems to me it is an idle work, even if we intend to have this act limited to the beginning of this Congress. The conclusions of this revision are not exact enactments, but are the conclusions which the compiler, or the reviser, or the committee have come to from the acts themselves. Why amend them?

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman misunderstands me. The law provided that there should be no allowance to members of Congress for newspapers, except that they should have an annual allowance of $125 each. As the law stood on the 1st day of December last, that allowance of $125 was taken away, leaving the statute to stand, forbidding any allowance to members for newspapers.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understand that perfectly well; and that law is now repealed by the recent law. Why undertake to amend this act, or to put in it, in the form of law, a conclusion which the committee have drawn from certain sections which have been repealed?

Mr. POLAND. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] seems to lose sight of the fact that we are making this book without the slightest reference to what has been done by this Congress. We are sitting here, as if we were here on the 1st day of December, before this Congress had done anything whatever, to determine what the statute law was on that day, and how it stood on that day. We say that the revisers were quite right in saying that on that day the statute law forbade any allowance to members of Congress for newspapers or for postage.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the committee had put into this act the words of the previous act, and allowed them to stand, there might be some propriety in it. But it would look like amending this law for some purpose, changing it in some form, having in view something to change the words of the former act. Why not put in the exact words of the statute?

Mr. POLAND. We have used the exact words of the statute, except that they are put into two or three sections instead of one. On the 1st day of December last the law in force in this country did forbid any allowance to members of Congress for newspapers, and did forbid any allowance to members of Congress for postage.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Certainly. But the gentleman must admit that this is construing the law, which is precisely what his colleague on the committee [Mr. E. R. HOAR] said they did not intend to do. He is certainly putting in here his conclusion. Some gentleman may differ with him as to what the law does mean. He is putting in his conclusion, his construction, which is what the committee said they would not do under any circumstances, and what the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] said he would not consent should be done, at the peril of the defeat of the whole thing.

Mr. POLAND. If my friend will examine this revision carefully, he will find that it does not purport to be a reprint of all the statutes. We could not do that and put them into this volume, or into two or three volumes. But out of all the statutes the commissioners, as well as they could, have ascertained how much of each is in force. They have divided them into different sections, have endeavored to put them into better form and in better phrase than before. Will the gentleman say that when this section says that "no Member or Delegate is entitled to any allowance for newspapers," and the next section that "no compensation or allowance shall now or hereafter be made to Senators, Representatives, or Delegates on account of postage"—will the gentleman say that that was not the statute law on the 1st day of December?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I will say that I have no knowledge, nor have I any belief, that these provisions as they stand in this act were ever in any law. "No Member or Delegate is entitled to any newspapers." I do not believe that such a provision as that was ever enacted. I believe it was the law that members might have just as many newspapers as they please. I do not believe this is a fair construction of the law. I do not believe the law can be so construed. I think the gentleman from Vermont cannot maintain for one moment that Congress ever passed a law providing that "no Member or Delegate is entitled to any newspapers." Certainly that never was done.

Mr. POLAND. My friend did not perhaps notice the change embodied in the amendment already proposed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. When the gentleman says that the committee want to put the provision in better phrase, I must say that I think they certainly have failed to do it. They would have done better to use the phrase in the old law; for I do not think it was ever intended to prohibit members of Congress from having newspapers. They may have been prohibited from receiving any money with which to buy newspapers.

Mr. POLAND. That is just the provision as we now amend it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is not in accordance with the words of the committee, which are that "no Member or Delegate is entitled to any newspapers."

Mr. POLAND. We have just proposed an amendment so as to make the language, "no Member or Delegate is entitled to any allowance for newspapers."

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then the gentleman has amended his own amendment. That is an additional erratum. [Laughter.]

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a suggestion to the committee. As the law stands to-day, I understand there is an allowance to members of the same amount formerly allowed for stationery.

Mr. POLAND. We have nothing to do with that.

Mr. CONGER. I know that; but I was about to suggest to the gentlemen of the committee that when this revision is finally completed and ready to be reprinted, it will probably be desirable to include in it all general laws up to the time, perhaps, when it is finally passed.

Mr. POLAND. We cannot do that.

Mr. CONGER. I think it would be well on such subjects as these to pass over those sections which have been changed since this revision was prepared, so that the committee may submit, at some future time, the later statutes and thus embody the existing law in this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to amend by striking out sections 46 and 47; and on that motion I call for a division.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 6, noes 17.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call for tellers.

Mr. POLAND. I really trust my friend from Wisconsin is not going to endeavor to stop us from proceeding with this work. When this series of evening sessions was ordered I did not expect we should be able, probably, ever to command the attendance of a quorum of the House. I hope my friend will let us go on with our work.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think we ought to have a quorum on these occasions. I insist upon tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDREDGE and Mr. POLAND were appointed.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that we now adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. It is very certain that we must have longer evening sessions than we have had this evening if we are to get along with this work; and if we are forbidden to do anything unless we can secure the attendance of a quorum, we may just as well abandon this work in the outset.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This law is not yet repealed. Nobody knows whether the President has signed the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I heard a gentleman say he had.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That statement we only get from the newspapers.

Mr. POLAND. I understand that we are proceeding upon an entire ignoring of anything that may be done during this session in the way of making laws. We are endeavoring to ascertain and set down what was the law at the beginning of this session, as if no Congress was ever to meet again and no new law to be passed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Members of Congress are paid for attending the sessions; and I think we should have a quorum.

Mr. PENDLETON. I insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 7, noes 30.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] on which the tellers appointed will please take their places.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, if my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is going to insist that we shall not go on without a quorum, we may just as well adjourn. I certainly do not want to subject members to the trouble and inconvenience of having a call of the House. If my friend from Wisconsin persists in saying that we shall not go on without a quorum, we may as well adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I insist that members of Congress ought to attend the sessions of the House.

Mr. POLAND. They certainly ought to; but let me ask my friend, in all seriousness, whether he expects we shall have a quorum in attendance at these evening sessions to consider this codification?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that if a quorum of the House cannot be in attendance, it is not a proper body to consider so important a measure as a revision of the statutes.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This is a subject to which no members except lawyers will give much attention. I believe we have, however, a sufficient number of lawyers to make a quorum; but it will be very difficult to get members who are not lawyers to attend.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman from Wisconsin persists in saying that he is going to object to our going on further to-night——

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will consent to strike out those sections we can go on. I do not think there is any proper body here to decide upon this question. I do not wish to be captious or to prevent action; but when a question which I deem important arises, and the decision appears to be against me, I propose to have a full vote upon it.

Mr. POLAND. I think it will not be necessary to go through the form of voting by tellers. I move to adjourn.

Mr. BECK. We might as well test the question, and bring members here, if we intend to go on with this business. As it is now, any gentleman has the right to object, just as the gentleman from Wisconsin has done. Some gentleman will object again, and we will be at the mercy of any one man. In my judgment, it is just as well to teach the lesson now, by bringing a quorum of members here at once.

Mr. KELLEY. I suggest we adjourn at present, for we will only punish ourselves by an all-night session; and announce that when we shall assemble again, if there be not a quorum present, a call of the House will be at once resorted to.

Mr. BECK. The reason I wish to make the motion now is, that we may as well punish ourselves now as at any other time, and if we get a quorum to-night we can go on with this business without any similar interruption. We might as well punish ourselves now once for all, or else we will have to adjourn every night on the objection of a single member.

Mr. KELLEY. We would save ourselves that punishment by coming together to-morrow night and at once having a call of the House.

Mr. BECK. We gave notice before to members to be here.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I wish to say that I have no doubt the members who are away to-night are away on the general understanding that there would be no vote on which they would be required to attend.

Mr. BECK. Why did the gentleman make a necessity for such a vote?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Because I had a right to do it.

Mr. BECK. Then I have the right to have a call of the House. He has no right to make a question, and then say I have no right to bring members here. I admit he is right.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. POLAND. Then I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, the act of Congress of June 27, 1866, authorized the appointment of three persons, learned in the law, for the term of three years, as commissioners—

To revise, simplify, arrange, and consolidate all statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature.—14 Statutes, 74.

The commissioners were duly appointed, and executed a part of the work assigned them, when the term expired. Congress, by act of May 4, 1870, revived the original statute, and authorized the appointment of three commissioners to complete the work within three years. (16 Statutes, 96.) The commissioners were duly appointed. They were authorized not merely to copy and arrange in proper order, and classify in heads the actual text of statutes in force, but to "supply the omissions and amend the imperfections of the original text." In executing this work they very often translated into their own language the ideas and objects of statutes, so that the new form adopted might be said to be inspired by Congress in ideas, but not in words. This mode frequently condensed existing laws, and thus often improved them.

As an illustration of this I will present an example.

The eleventh Article of War, as it is found in the act of April 10, 1806, (2 Statutes at Large, 361,) reads thus:

ART. 11. After a non-commissioned officer or soldier shall have been duly enlisted and sworn, he shall not be dismissed the service without a discharge in writing; and no discharge granted to him shall be sufficient which is not signed by a field officer of the regiment to which he belongs, or commanding officer where no field officer of the regiment is present; and no discharge shall be given to a non-commissioned officer or soldier before his term of service has expired, but by order of the President, the Secretary of War, the commanding officer of a department, or the sentence of a general court-martial; nor shall a commissioned officer be discharged the service but by order of the President of the United States, or by sentence of a general court-martial.

In the commissioners' report, or draught of revision, (volume 1, page 643, article 4,) this is translated into other words, thus:

Discharges.

Art. of War 11.

"ART. 4. No enlisted man, duly sworn, shall be discharged from the service without a discharge in writing, signed by a field officer of the regiment to which he belongs, or by the commanding officer, when no field officer is present; and no discharge shall be given to any enlisted man before his term of service has expired, except by order of the President, the Secretary of War, the commanding officer of a department, [the commander of a separate army,] or by sentence of a general court-martial."

The words in brackets ["the commander of a separate army"] are not in the original article, and are designed as a suggested addition.

The last clause of the original article is transferred in the revision to article 99 of the Articles of War, page 662.

The work of the commissioners was completed by the prescribed time of May 4, 1873, and is found in eight immense unpublished volumes now in the committee-room of the Committee on Revision of the Laws. These volumes contain the original statutes cut out of the volumes of statutes and pasted on to sheets of paper with the changes marked or noted by erasures and otherwise. These constitute the final work and real report of the commissioners. But the result of their labors was published from time to time in parts, and finally all arranged and bound in two large volumes, containing in all twenty-six hundred and sixty-eight pages. These are called "Revision of the United States Statutes as drafted by the commissioners," &c. Their real report, as I have described it, is known as "Draught or Revision of the Laws," though the two published volumes are popularly known by the same designation. The revision and draught were found to contain so many changes of existing laws, so much legislation, so much of a departure from the actual existing law, that it was probably believed in Congress that, however desirable, and however much of an improvement most of the changes might be, the report could not be adopted as a whole and enacted into one entire system.

The act of March 3, 1873, therefore was passed, which authorized a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, taken in part from the House Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to accept from the commissioners their draught or revision of the laws. (17 Statutes, 579.)

The act of 1873 authorized the joint committee to contract with some suitable person to prepare, under regulations to be prescribed by the committee, in the form of a bill to be presented to Congress in December, 1873, the revision of the statutes which might be reported by the commissioners. This work was done by Hon. Thomas J. Durant, and the general laws were condensed in one large volume of fourteen hundred and thirty-one pages. The Indian treaties, post-routes, and code of military offenses are each separate and in addition to this. The treaties with foreign nations are not embraced in the revision, because there is a compilation of these under the authority of the State Department published in 1871, as Senate Executive Document No. 36, third session Forty-first Congress, with notes of judicial decisions thereon, &c. The commissioners, whose revision in two volumes is now before us, and Mr. Durant, whose work is also here, as I have described it, have all certainly displayed great learning, ability, and skill in this very difficult and herculean labor assigned them.

It was the purpose of Mr. Durant's revision to present the actual state of the law as it existed on the 1st day of December, 1873, except only that the code of laws "in regard to military offenses" does not profess to represent existing law, but to be a bill on that subject, new in many respects, submitted for the action of Congress. But his revision undoubtedly includes legislation, or rather I might say it has been impossible to avoid it. A construction of a statute in new words is legislation. In his volume of general laws, page 643, he gives as his third article of war the exact language employed by the commissioners, which has been read, omitting the words in brackets. The last clause of the eleventh article of war he transfers to section 84, of the "bill to codify and regulate the laws in regard to military offenses."

The commissioners, as the law under which they acted required of them, added "side notes" or marginal references on the pages of their volumes to the original statute, giving the volume, chapter, page, and section "from which each section is compiled and to the decisions of the Federal (national) courts, explaining or expounding the same, and also to such decisions of the State courts" as they deemed expedient.

The statute under which Mr. Durant acted did not require any such reference, and he has, therefore, omitted all this. His work does not adopt in all respects the same plan or arrangement as that of the commissioners, and where the general plan is the same the same order in arranging sections is not always observed. It is not always, if generally, practicable to refer from Durant's work to that of the commissioners for the side-notes or marginal references.

I would regard it as a great misfortune, if this revision of the laws shall be adopted, that it should be published without marginal references to each section, pointing out the volume, chapter, page, and section of the original act or acts from which it is compiled. In such revision or compilation as this I do not for a moment believe that, as a general rule, any inference would arise as to the meaning or effect of any provision from the fact that it has been classified in one title rather than in another. The commissioners in their revision so provided, (volume 1, chapter 2, page 13, section 7.) The classification here is only matter of "real or supposed convenience or propriety." But the duty, both of interpretation and construction, so often devolving on courts, is or may be aided much by the time, history, and attendant circumstances of the original enactment of the statute now newly arranged, with condensation or change of language designed only to carry out the purpose that originally gave rise to it. The original arrangement of the words, sentences, clauses, and sections of an act is valuable in ascertaining their meaning, upon the maxim noscitur a sociis.

The original chronological arrangement of statutes each with reference to others may be significant in giving their meaning and purpose. Statutes in pari materia are to be construed together and read each in the light of the other.

It will be an immense labor if the bench and bar must scrape their way through seventeen large volumes of statutes, including our national legislation since June 1, 1789, to hunt out from this immense mass the sources from which the compilation has been made, with no guide to direct the way. Then it would be a grave mistake to send out this compilation without at least marginal references or foot-notes indicating the authoritative decisions made by national and State courts explaining and construing the statutes. Human wisdom probably cannot frame a statute of any importance about which there may not be well-grounded differences of opinion. The value of certainty we all know; the great dangers to arise from doubt and uncertainty are equally well understood. Our own national Constitution, written down in immortal words by the profoundest statesmen and ablest lawyers of the revolutionary period, has given rise to questions of interpretation and construction requiring many and learned volumes by the ablest commentators, and yet it can scarcely be said there is a single provision of it the meaning of which, in all its bearings, is placed beyond dispute. Our statutes are open to equal or greater uncertainties. So far as questions affecting or pointing out their meaning have been decided by authoritative courts, their rulings are as much a part of the statute law as though incorporated in it in so many words. It would now be just as wise to omit important words, sentences, or paragraphs from existing statutes as to omit from the codified laws the judicial interpretations made by authoritative courts.

I call the attention of the House and of the learned chairman of the Committee on Revision of Laws, [Mr. POLAND,] with whom I have the honor to be associated on the committee, to this subject, so that provision may be made in some form for supplying the marginal references or foot-notes to which I have referred. The marginal notes should go beyond all this; and where a statute embraces the subject-matter of, or is designed to afford remedies under, many others, these should all be referred to, or its scope and effect cannot be understood without much labor and research—liable to mistake or oversight at the very times when accuracy will be most important.

Now, to illustrate the necessity of these marginal references in the three classes of cases I have stated, I will present some examples.

But, first, let me cite another provision of law as it exists in force, translated in the words of the commissioners from several successive acts of Congress on the same subject.

The second section of the Indian appropriation act of April 10, 1869, (16 Statutes, 39,) reads thus:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all goods and merchandise furnished any tribe or band of Indians, under the provisions of any act, shall be turned over by the agent or superintendent of such tribe or band to the chiefs of the tribe or band in bulk, and in the original package, as nearly as practicable, and in the presence of the head-men of the tribe, if practicable, to be distributed to the tribe or band by the chiefs in such manner as the chiefs may deem best, in the presence of the agent or superintendent: Provided, That said chiefs have observed their treaty obligations with the Government, as hereinbefore stated.

This is translated in volume 1 of the commissioners' Revision, page 1007, section 74, with marginal page and note, thus:

"SEC. 74. No delivery of goods or merchandise, or payment of any money, shall be made to the chiefs of any tribe, by authority of any treaty, if such chiefs have violated the stipulations contained in such treaty upon their part."

Withholding goods, &c., from chiefs who have violated treaty stipulations.

10 April, 1869, ch. 16, § 2, vol. 16, p. 39.

NOTE.—The section in the text is founded upon a proviso at the end of the section cited, but is differently expressed.

The words in italic indicate that the commissioners recommend their insertion as an amendment.

Mr. Durant, in his revision (page 459, section 2106) adopts the same translation, omitting, of course, the words in italic, as his labor was to present the existing law.

And to illustrate the extent to which statutes have been construed let me cite an example:

In the commissioners' reported Draught, volume 1, pages 354-355, chapter 7, certain sections of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, (1 Statutes, 78,) are given with marginal references to decisions, as follows:

"SEC. 100. The circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction as follows:

Aliens, citizens of different States.

24 Sept., 1789, ch. 20, § 11, vol. 1, p. 78.

"1. Of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $500, and an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the State where it is brought and a citizen of another State: Provided, That no circuit court should have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee,

2 Dall., 381; 4 Dall., 8, 12, 339, 338, 390; 4 Cr., 61, 303; 6 Cr., 332; 2 Wh., 290; 3 Wh., 591; 6 Wh., 146; 8 Wh., 642, 699; 9 Wh., 537; 2 Pet., 126, 318, 556; 7 Pet., 253, 413; 12 Pet., 164, 327; 13

unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange."

"2. Of all suits in equity, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the United States are petitioners.

Suits at common law by United States or officers.

24 Sept., 1789, ch. 20, §§ 9, 11, vol. 1, pp. 76, 78; 3 March, 1815, ch. 101, § 4, vol. 3, p. 245.

"3. Of all suits at common law where the United States, or any officer thereof suing under the authority of any act of Congress, are plaintiffs."

Section 9 of the judiciary act provides that the district courts "shall have cognizance * * * of all suits at common law where the United States sue, and the matter in dispute amounts, exclusive of costs, to the sum or value of $100." Section 11 provides that the circuit courts shall have cognizance "of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners." Section 4 of the act of 3 March, 1815, provides, "That the district courts of the United States shall have cognizance, concurrent with * * * the circuit courts of the United States, of all suits at common law, where the United States, or any officer thereof, under the authority of any act of Congress, shall sue, although the debt, claim, or other matter in dispute shall not amount to one hundred dollars."

It was held in The Postmaster-General vs. Early, 12 Wheaton, 136, that the last-named act had the effect to extend to the circuit courts jurisdiction of suits at common law, by the United States, or by its officers when authorized to sue, without regard to amount. This left undisturbed the limitation as to suits by the United States in equity.

To illustrate the value and convenience of references to numerous statutes, all seeking remedies under one section of another act, I refer again to two provisions giving jurisdiction to circuit courts, as found in volume 1, pages 355 and 357, of the commissioners' reported Draught, as follows:

Suits under import, internal-revenue, and postal laws.

Imports, 2 March, 1833, ch. 57, § 2, vol. 4, p. 632.

NOTE.—The act of 2 March, 1833, provides, "That the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States shall extend to all cases, in law or equity, arising under the revenue laws (i. e., relating to imports and tonnage) of the United States, for which other provisions are not already made by law." Section 9 of the judiciary act had already provided for the cases excepted in the preceding section. It had given to the district courts "exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, * * * of all seizures on land, or other waters than as aforesaid, (referring to the clause relating to admiralty jurisdiction,) * * * and of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States."

These are illustrations taken at random. These marginal references are all omitted in Durant's revision. It should have them all, and there should be in the last two paragraphs I have cited a reference not only to the original acts but to their location, so far as in force in the new revision. Mr. Durant has prepared an index to his whole work which is full, elaborate, and exhaustive, but it is not yet printed. When the entire work shall be adopted by Congress, provision can be made for adding in its publication the marginal references and foot-notes suggested.

There is so great a necessity for a complete revision of the general laws of a permanent nature, published in a compact and convenient form, that I trust it may speedily be had. Six years of patient labor has been given to the work by the commissioners. More than half a year has been devoted to it by Mr. Durant. I do not know that it is practicable to procure a revision in more perfect form. It is due to this Congress and to the legal profession and the country to say that absolute perfection is impossible. When all shall be done that can be done, the result will only approximate absolute accuracy.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] told the House a few days since that the improper location of a mark of punctuation in a customs-revenue statute cost the Treasury a quarter of a million dollars. But this is most remarkable, since punctuation is not to be regarded to defeat the object of a law. (See remarks of Mr. MYERS, House of Representatives, January 21, 1874, and Durant's Revision, page 605, line 1054, and page 619, lines 206, 207.)

In the revision of seventeen volumes there will undoubtedly be not only erroneous punctuation, but some omissions of provisions of laws in force; some misconstruction of statutes carried into the new phraseology adopted; some provisions of laws put down as in force which may have been repealed, and some other errors occur which will escape all the care, vigilance, and scrutiny that have been or can be given to the revision. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has already called attention to the fact that the original article 61 of the Articles of War, as found in the act of April 10, 1806, (2 Statutes, 366,) is put down as in force in Durant's Revision of General Statutes, page 297, article 58, and so it is in the commissioners' reported Draught, volume 1, page 665, article 122, though it was expressly repealed by act of March 3, 1869, (15 Statutes, 281.) And this is the more remarkable, since the commissioners report that they examined this act of March 3, 1869. (See reported Draught, volume 1, page 673.) It is due to Mr. Durant to say that his duty under his employment was not to examine all the original statutes and compile a new revision; for he could not in half a year perform a labor that had consumed six years of the time of three commissioners, or eighteen years of labor in all.

To understand the plan of this revision I may state another, among its many features.

There are two general modes of making a revision.

One is to adopt the chronological order of locating the statutes, giving so much of each as may be in force. This plan was adopted by Curwen in his one volume of collated laws in force in Ohio, and his argument in favor of it is able and plausible.

The other plan is that adopted as to the revision now under consideration, of bringing "together all statutes and parts of statutes which from similarity of subject ought to be brought together," as is said in the original act under which the commissioners were appointed. This plan arranges statutes or parts of statutes according to topic. In such a revision a topic may or may not be divided into classes. Thus the topic of "civil rights" may comprehend all laws, civil or criminal, relating to that subject, or it may itself be divided by placing a declaration of civil rights in one chapter, civil remedies for their violation under "procedure," and punishments for their violation under "crimes."

The plan adopted is to collate in one title of "civil rights" the statutes which declare them, which point out the remedies to be pursued, in the manner required in judiciary and procedure statutes; and to insert under the title of "crimes" and under the subdivision chapter of "crimes against the elective franchise and civil rights" the penal provisions of the civil-rights acts.

The revision does not therefore adopt the plan of giving in one connected view all the statute law in force as to civil rights, but detaches them into the more systematic plan of a more minute topical arrangement.

A reference to this will indicate the manner in which the purposes of the several civil-rights statutes have been translated into the words of the compiler, and possibly may show verbal modifications bordering on legislation.

The original civil-rights act of April 9, 1866, will be found in 14 Statutes, 27, the first two sections of which are as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race or color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right, in every State or Territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of the person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Next in order of time is the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution, one section of which is as follows:

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Then the enforcement act of May 31, 1870, (16 Statutes, 144,) in sections 16 and 17, re-enacts in modified words the substance of the original civil-rights sections, the re-enactment being in these words:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State or Territory in the United States to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, to the contrary notwithstanding. [No tax or charge shall be imposed or enforced by any State upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country, which is not equally imposed and enforced upon every person immigrating to such State from any other foreign country; and any law of any State in conflict with this provision is hereby declared null and void.]

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by the last preceding section of this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties, on account of such person being an alien, or by reason of his color, or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of citizens, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

In the reported draught of the commissioners, as in Durant's revision, the act of May 31, 1870, is very properly not treated as a revision of the whole subject, and hence as superseding the entire original act. The commissioners, in volume 1, page 947, title 26, sections 1, 2, and 3, and Mr. Durant in his volume of General Laws, page 432, title 24, sections 1982, 1983, and 1984, both, under the head of "civil rights," translate the sections I have cited from the acts of 1866 and 1870, so far as they relate to a declaration of existing rights, and confer a right of civil action for their violation as follows:

Equal rights under the law.

31 May, 1870, ch. 114, § 16, vol. 16, p. 144.

1 Abb. U. S., 28, 84, 388.

"SECTION 1. All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other.

Rights of citizens in respect to real and personal property.

8 April, 1866, ch. 31, § 1, vol. 14, p. 27.

"SEC. 2. All citizens of the United States shall have the same right, in every State and Territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property.

Civil action for deprivation of rights.

20 April, 1871, ch. 22, § 1, vol. 17, p. 13.

"SEC. 3. Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress."

It is proper to state here that the last clause of section 16 of the act of May 31, 1870, which I have read, beginning with the words "no tax," &c., is retained in Durant's revision, but is placed in a section which I have not deemed it necessary to cite.

A comparison of all these will present a fair specimen of the manner in which the work has been done, and from these all can judge of the accuracy of the translation.

But this is not all of civil rights in the revision.

It will be seen the original civil-rights act of April 9, 1866, and the re-enacted civil-rights sections of the "enforcement act" of May 31, 1870, contain provisions for criminal prosecutions.

After these were enacted Congress passed the "Ku-Klux act," approved April 20, 1871, (17 Statutes, 13,) for the protection of civil and political rights and other objects, section 1 of which is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution of the United States, shall, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary notwithstanding, be liable to the party injured, in any action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress; such proceeding to be prosecuted in the several district or circuit courts of the United States, with and subject to the same rights of appeal, review upon error, and other remedies provided in like cases in such courts, under the provisions of the act of the 9th of April, 1866, entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication," and the other remedial laws of the United States which are in their nature applicable in such cases.

Mr. Durant, in his Revision of General Laws, chapter 7, of "crimes against the elective franchise and civil rights," page 141, section 5577, condenses into one the three criminal sections I have cited from the acts of April 9, 1866, May 31, 1870, and April 20, 1871, in these words:

SEC. 5577. Every person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities, secured or protected by the Constitution and laws of the United States, or to different punishments, pains, or penalties, on account of such inhabitant being an alien, or by reason of his color or race, than are prescribed for the punishment of citizens, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not more than one year, or by both.

While the three acts contain each a criminal section differing in words each from the other, and each section covering some crimes perhaps not covered by either of the others, the one consolidated section of Durant is made applicable to the violations of rights alike in the three acts. It requires great care to compare and examine the effect of all this, and it is possible that the new consolidated section may operate differently from the three original sections in a very few cases. But the change, if any, cannot be objectionable, but is valuable as securing uniformity.

The commissioners in their Revision, under the same classification of "crimes against the elective franchise and the civil rights of persons," (chapter 7, volume 2, page 2627,) translate the criminal sections thus:

Violation of provisions of section.

31 May, 1870, ch. 114, § 17, vol. 16, p. 144.

"SEC. 190. Every person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by section [illegible] of the title 'civil rights,' or to different punishments, pains, or penalties, on account of such inhabitant being an alien, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of citizens, shall be punished by fine not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not more than one year, or by both."

Their marginal reference is only to act of "31 May, 1870, ch. 14, sec. 17, vol. 16, p. 144," and certainly is not sufficiently comprehensive to include all covered by the first section of the "Ku-Klux act" of April 20, 1871, and the omission is not elsewhere supplied in the published volumes of their revision.

This mode of classifying the statutes to some extent duplicates in the revision portions of statutes, since the same language is in part necessarily repeated under the chapters declaring civil rights and defining crimes.

There are cases where portions of a statute are four times repeated over under different heads. I will refer to an example.

The act of March 2, 1863, "to prevent and punish frauds upon the Government," &c., provides a punishment by court-martial against persons in the military or naval service who make a fraudulent claim on the Government, and a punishment in the courts having criminal jurisdiction against persons not in the military or naval service for the same kind of fraud, and provides also for forfeitures, (12 Statutes, 696, 698;) the statute presents the whole law therein in one connected form as to all persons.

In Durant's revision this is very properly translated into four distinct provisions: one in title 36, under the caption of "debts due by or to the United States," (page 911, section 3551,) which mentions the forfeitures, but refers to a second translated provision in section 5506, title "crimes" (page 1391) for the acts which will incur the forfeitures, and which also prescribe punishment; then in the "Articles for the government of the Navy," (page 313, article 14,) the same provision is again translated; and the bill to codify and regulate military offenses (in article 78) repeats the same acts, qualified by a limitation excluding civilians as subjects for the cognizance of courts-martial.

The commissioners omit any reference to this law under their title of "debts due by or to the United States," but they translate portions of it in their title of "crimes," chapter v, volume 2, page 2603, section 124; and again in the "Articles of War," volume 1, page 653, article 60; and again in the "Articles for the government of the Navy," volume 1, page 748, article 14.

I refer to these to show the plan of the work so the House may be in possession of some idea of the revision.

I will not add to this view of the plan of revision, but will say the work before us is of immense importance, and if put in proper form will be of great value to the bench and bar, to all officers, and to the public.

The chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws [Mr. POLAND] did me the honor to assign to me for examination the titles following: Title 14—The Army; Title 15—The Navy; Title 16—The Militia; Title 17—Arms, armories, and arsenals; Title 20—Flag and seal; Title 21—Seat of Government, including public buildings; Title 22—The States; Title 23—The Territories; Title 24—Civil rights; Title 25—Citizenship; Title 26—The elective franchise; Title 27—The freedmen; Title 28—Indians.

I have spent some weeks of patient labor in the examination of these titles, and will present in due time the conclusions at which I have arrived, and now will bear testimony to the general accuracy and great value of the revision.

The Clerk read as follows:

Two stenographers, at a salary of $4,947 a year each.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to alter that clause by striking out the word "four" and inserting the word "five," and striking out "nine hundred" and inserting "thirty" instead of "forty;" so it will read:

Two stenographers, at a salary of $5,037 a year each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will say that is a correction taken from the table of errata; so that it will be understood as an error in the work itself.

Mr. HALE, of New York. In lines 60 to 63 I find:

One Doorkeeper, while such position is held by the present incumbent and no longer, at a salary of $3,000 a year.

I submit whether that was a provision of law in existence on the 1st of December. Was there a Doorkeeper of the House between the 3d of March last and the 1st of December?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Suppose an extra session had been called.

Mr. HALE, of New York. In that connection I suggest a verbal correction, as it is a little blind as it stands. The words should be transposed so as to read:

One Doorkeeper, at a salary of $3,000 a year, while such position is held by the present incumbent, and no longer.

The same transposition should be made in the clauses relating to the Chief Clerk and the Journal clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 82. After the 4th day of March, 1875, no money shall be paid from the Treasury for the publication of the laws in newspapers.

Mr. CONGER. We have made a good start in this good work to-night; and I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. I would suggest that at the rate we have gone to-night it will take a hundred evenings to complete the work.

Mr. CONGER. I think we had better not discourage members by keeping them too late the first night.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will say to the members of the House present, if they think we can safely go on, without the reading, to the end of this title, (Title 2, The Congress,) that I have carefully compared every section in that title, and that there is no amendment to be offered by the committee or by the revisers; and I believe that every section will be found to correspond exactly with the law as it now stands—the laws being recent which apply to the subject—with one single exception. This is in section 89, where the committee propose to strike out three or four words which are wholly unnecessary. That is the whole amendment, to the end of this title, which they propose to make. If it would be in accordance with the wishes of gentlemen present that these chapters under these circumstances should be read by their title, and that we should consider the work completed as far as title 3, commencing on page 28, this would make about the proportion of work we had hoped to get through with to-night. If any gentleman objects, or has any reason to think that there is anything here to which he wishes to call attention, I will not press the suggestion I have made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am not going to make any objection; but I want to have the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] keep himself consistent with himself if possible. I would like to know upon what principle he can strike out these two or three words, unnecessary as he thinks, when he could not consent to amend the section, which I thought was absurd as it now reads, and did not express the law as it was intended to have been enacted.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The difference is that I do not agree with the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That was not the ground on which he put it. He put it on the ground that it was an amendment; that whatever the absurdity, that whatever there might be that was wrong in it, that was no reason why it should be amended, because its amendment would violate the position which the committee had taken not to interfere, however the law may read, whatever amendment might seem to be proper.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will state to the gentleman that this amendment which I now propose to make differs from what he refers to in the fact that the words remaining contain exactly what we propose to strike out.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have no objection to the gentleman striking out these words. Still I cannot see how he is consistent in his objection to the amending of the section which I proposed to amend, because it did not express the law as I thought the Congress enacting it intended to enact it. And I would say further that, where a gentleman of the committee can state, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated, that he has compared a particular chapter section by section with the law as it now stands, and is able to state from the examination and consideration he has given it that it is the exact law as it now stands, I would rather take his statement upon it than go through with it in detail in the presence of this august assemblage of the House of Representatives. I think it is as likely, and perhaps more likely, to be right, if we adopt a chapter on such an assurance than to have this numerous body consider every section of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] insist on his motion?

Mr. CONGER. I am under the necessity of objecting to-night to passing over any of these chapters without reading. I may assent hereafter to such a thing being done.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Then I assent to the motion of adjournment.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BASS: Resolutions of the National Board of Trade, asking that underwriters receive their proportion of the Geneva award, in the same manner and upon the same terms as individuals, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BROMBERG: The petition of the Board of Trade of Mobile, Alabama, for a further appropriation to complete the opening of the bars in Mobile Bay, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CHAFFEE: The petition of the Wool-Growers' Association of Huerfano County, Colorado, for a higher tariff on foreign wool, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The remonstrance of Wright Rives and others, property-holders on Third street northwest, in the city of Washington, against the passage of a bill to incorporate the Capitol, North O street and South Washington Railway Company, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. COTTON: The petition of the Chicago, Clinton and Dubuque Railroad Company, of the Chicago, Dubuque and Minnesota Railroad Company, and of many citizens of Iowa, asking that the bridge across the Mississippi River at Clinton, Iowa, be opened to the use of all railroads desiring to use the same, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. COX: The petition of E. S. Jaffray & Co. and others, importers of hand-made lace goods in the city of New York, for a reduction of duty on such goods to 20 per cent. ad valorem, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of Thomas Warner, for remuneration for valuable inventions used in the armories of the United States, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAMILTON: Resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from that State to vote for an appropriation in aid of the centennial celebration, to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the Proposed National Census of 1875.

By Mr. HERNDON: Several petitions of citizens of Texas, for the improvement of Sabine Pass, on the coast of Texas, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LANSING: The petition of the heirs of Richard W. Meade, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LOFLAND: The petition of the First-day School of the Society of Friends of Wilmington, Delaware, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of citizens of New Castle County, Delaware, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, reducing the duties on certain articles 10 per cent., to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of druggists of Iowa, for the repeal of the stamp tax on medicines, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of William Wheeler Hubbell, in relation to the currency, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. POLAND: The memorial of P. P. Pitchlynn, delegate of the Choctaw Nation of Indians, in relation to the right of that nation to be paid the money awarded them by the United States Senate on the 9th day of March, 1859, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, the petition of C. O. Whitmore & Sons and others, of Boston, Massachusetts, associates in and insured by mutual insurance companies, asking to be reimbursed from the Geneva award fund for losses by rebel cruisers, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Martin D. Chandler, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey: Resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in relation to the centennial celebration, to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the Proposed National Census of 1875.

By Mr. SENER: The petition or John Moncure, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. SHELDON: The petition of James G. Taliaferro, for relief as surety on the bond of Robert W. Taliaferro, late postmaster at New Orleans, Louisiana, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: The remonstrance of H. L. Pelouze & Co., of Richmond, Virginia, against the repeal of the duty on printing type, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: The memorial of Arthur W. McCarty, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STANARD: The petition of the National Board of Trade, for the early establishment of a territorial government over the Indian Territory, to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. SWANN: The memorial of importers of vinegar, against increased duties on that article, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TOWNSEND: The petition of citizens of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduces the duties on certain manufactured articles 10 per cent., to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WARD, of New Jersey: The petition of certain citizens of New Jersey, for the improvement of Keyport Harbor, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WOLFE: The remonstrance of the State Board of Agriculture of Indiana, against the extension by Congress of patents now expiring upon sewing and other machines, to the Committee on Patents.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 22, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1393) providing for the assignment of judges in the Territories was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 215) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register, commonly called the Blue Book; which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, in relation to moieties given to customs officers and informers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT presented the petition of Mrs. Isabella Beecher Hooker and others, praying for the passage of a law exempting women from taxation as long as they are unrepresented in the national councils; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of Susan B. Anthony, of the city of Rochester, State of New York. This petition states that prior to the last presidential election the petitioner applied to the board of registry in the eighth ward of the city of Rochester to be registered as a voter. That question was discussed before the board in her presence, and after consideration they decided that she was entitled to have her name placed upon the registry, and placed it there accordingly. On the day of the election she, in common with hundreds of other American citizens, her neighbors, whose names had also been registered as voters, offered to the inspectors of election her ballot for electors of President and Vice-President and for members of Congress, which were received and deposited in the ballot-box by the inspectors.

She says that for this act an indictment was found against her by the grand jury at the sitting of the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York, at Albany, charging her, under the nineteenth section of the act of Congress of May 31, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes," with having knowingly voted without having a lawful right to vote. She says that to that indictment she pleaded "not guilty;" and the trial of the issue thus joined took place at the circuit court at Canandaigua, in the county of Ontario, before the Hon. Ward Hunt, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the 18th day of June last. Upon that trial the facts of voting by the petitioner and that she was a woman were not denied; nor was it claimed on the part of the Government that the petitioner lacked any of the qualifications of a voter unless disqualified by reason of her sex.

She further says, that it was shown on behalf of the petitioner on the trial that before voting she called upon a respectable lawyer and asked his opinion whether she had a right to vote, and he advised her that she had such right; and the lawyer was examined as a witness in her behalf, and testified that he gave her such advice, and that he gave it in good faith, believing that she had such right. It also appeared that when she offered to vote the question whether, as a woman, she had a right to vote was raised by the inspectors, considered by them in her presence, and they decided that she had a right to vote, and received her vote accordingly.

It was shown on the part of the Government that on the examination of the petitioner before the commissioner on whose warrant she was arrested, the petitioner stated that she would have voted, if allowed to vote, without reference to the advice of the attorney whose opinion she asked; that she was not induced to vote by that opinion; that she had before determined to offer her vote, and had no doubt about her right to vote.

At the close of the testimony the petitioner's counsel proceeded to address the jury, and stated that he desired to present for consideration three propositions, two of law and one of fact:

First. That the petitioner had a lawful right to vote.

Secondly. That whether she had a right to vote or not, if she honestly believed that she had that right, and voted in good faith in that belief, she was guilty of no crime.

Thirdly. That when the petitioner gave her vote she gave it in good faith, believing that it was her right to do so.

The first two propositions presented questions for the court to decide, and the last a question for the jury. When the petitioner's counsel had proceeded thus far the judge suggested that the counsel had better discuss, in the first place, the questions of law, which the counsel proceeded to do, and having discussed the two legal questions at length, asked leave then to say a few words to the jury on the question of fact. The judge then said to the counsel that he thought that had better be left until the views of the court upon the legal questions should be known.

The district attorney thereupon addressed the court at length upon the legal questions, and at the close of his argument the judge delivered an opinion adverse to the positions of the petitioner's counsel upon both of the legal questions presented, holding that the petitioner was not entitled to vote, and that if she voted in good faith in the belief, in fact, that she had a right to vote, it would constitute no defense; the ground of the decision of the last point being that the petitioner was bound to know that by law she was not a legal voter, and that even if she voted in good faith in the contrary belief, it constituted no defense to the crime with which she was charged. The decision of the judge upon those questions was read from a written document, and at the close of the reading the judge said that the decision of these questions disposed of the case, and left no question of fact for the jury, and therefore he should direct the jury to find a verdict of "guilty." The judge then said to the jury that the decision of the court had disposed of all there was in the case, and he directed them to find a verdict of "guilty," and he instructed the clerk to enter such a verdict.

At this time, before any entry was made by the clerk, the petitioner's counsel asked the judge to submit the case to the jury, and to give to the jury the following several instructions:

First. That if the defendant at the time of voting believed that she had a right to vote, and voted in good faith in that belief, she was not guilty of the offense charged.

Secondly. That in determining the question whether she did or did not believe that she had a right to vote, the jury might take into consideration as bearing upon that question the advice which she received from the counsel to whom she applied.

Thirdly. That they might also take into consideration, as bearing upon the same question the fact, that the inspectors considered the question, and came to the conclusion that she had a right to vote.

Fourthly. That the jury had a right to find a general verdict of "guilty" or "not guilty" as they should believe that she had or had not been guilty of the offense described in the statute.

I would here remind Senators that the language of the statute is that a party shall have "knowingly" committed the offense in order to be guilty.

The judge declined to submit the case to the jury upon any question whatever, and directed them to render a verdict of guilty against the petitioner. The petitioner's counsel excepted to the decision of the judge upon the legal questions, and to his direction to the jury to find a verdict of "guilty," insisting that it was a direction which no court had a right to give in any criminal case. The judge then directed the clerk to take the verdict, and the clerk said: "Gentlemen of the jury, hearken to your verdict as the court hath recorded it. You say you find the defendant guilty of the offense charged. So say you all." No response whatever was made by the jury, either by word or sign. They had not consulted together in their seats or otherwise. Neither of them had spoken a word, nor had they been asked whether they had or had not agreed upon a verdict.

The petitioner's counsel then asked that the clerk be requested to poll the jury. The judge said, "That cannot be allowed; gentlemen of the jury, you are discharged;" and the jury left the box. No juror spoke a word during the trial from the time when they were impaneled until the time of their discharge. After denying a motion for a new trial, the judge proceeded upon the conviction thus obtained to pass sentence upon the petitioner, imposing upon her a fine of $100 and the costs of the prosecution.

The petitioner respectfully submits that in these proceedings she has been denied the rights guaranteed by the Constitution to all persons accused of crime—the right of trial by jury and the right to have the assistance of counsel in their defense. She thinks it is a mockery to call her trial a trial by jury; and unless the assistance of counsel may be limited to the argument of legal questions, without the privilege of saying a word to the jury upon the question of the guilt or innocence in fact of the party charged, or the privilege of ascertaining from the jury whether they do or do not agree to the verdict announced by the court in their name, she has been denied the assistance of counsel for her defense.

The petitioner also respectfully insists that the decision of the judge that good faith on the part of the petitioner in offering her vote did not constitute a defense was not only a violation of the deepest and most sacred principle of the criminal law, that no one can be guilty of crime unless a criminal intent exists, but was also a palpable violation of the statute under which the conviction was had, not on the ground that good faith could in this or in any case justify a criminal act, but on the ground that bad faith in voting was an indispensable ingredient of the offense of which the petitioner was charged. Any other interpretation strikes the word "knowingly" out of the statute, the word which alone describes the essence of the offense. The statute means, as the petitioner is advised, and humbly submits, a knowledge in fact, not a knowledge falsely imputed by law to a party not possessing it in fact, as the judge in this case has held. Crimes cannot, either in law or in morals, be established by judicial falsehood. If there be any crime in the case, the petitioner humbly insists it is to be found in such an adjudication.

Of the decision of the judge upon the question of the right of the petitioner to vote she makes no complaint. It was a question properly belonging to the court to decide; was fully and fairly submitted to the judge; and of his decision, whether right or wrong, the petitioner is well aware she cannot here complain. But in regard to her conviction of crime, which she insists for the reasons given was in violation of the principles of the common law, of common morality, of the statute under which she was charged, and of the Constitution, a crime of which she was as innocent as the judge by whom she was convicted—she respectfully asks, inasmuch as the law has provided no means of reviewing the decisions of the judge or of correcting his errors, that the fine imposed upon the petitioner be removed as an expression of the sense of this high tribunal that her conviction was unjust.

This is dated January 12, 1874, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I will state that there are several precedents in favor of the action asked for by Miss Anthony in this petition. I move, also, that the petition be printed; it is not very lengthy.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of business men of Philadelphia, stating that no redemption has been offered for the legal-tender notes outstanding since 1862, and praying for the enactment of laws directing the redemption or conversion of these notes by issuing therefor, at the option of the holder, bonds of the denomination of $1,000 and its multiple; said bonds to be made payable on demand in legal-tender notes, the bonds to bear interest at some fixed rate, say 3.65 per cent. per annum; and also that permission be granted to national banks to count such bonds in the reserve required to be kept by law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Philadelphia County Medical Society, asking the repeal of section 6 of the Army appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1869, and the enactment of such a law as will confer upon the Medical Department of the Army the emoluments and rank which justly belong to it; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying reimbursement of money expended by them in 1863 in fortifying the city of Pittsburgh under the authority of the Secretary of War; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Hugh T. Lyttle, private in Company H, Thirty-second Regiment Ohio Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of John O'Connor, Lewis Jacobs, Charles Alexander, Martin Basilis, John Johnson, and Samuel F. Reynolds, of Brooklyn, New York, praying an amendment of the act of March 2, 1867, so that their naval pensions may commence from the date of their discharge from the service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONOVER. I present a resolution of the General Assembly of Florida, in favor of the United States Government extending aid to Cuba, which I ask may be read and laid on the table.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the people of the island of Cuba have been, and are still, struggling for their national existence, and are trying to establish a free government for themselves and their children; and whereas the war waged by the Spanish government has no parallel for its inhumanity in modern times, and should not be permitted by any civilized government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the people of the State of Florida represented in senate and assembly, That the Congress of the United States is requested to adopt such legislation as may be necessary to enable the national Government to extend such aid to the people of Cuba as becomes a great republic, whose people so ardently sympathize with an oppressed nation; and

Be it further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to present these resolutions to their respective bodies as expressive of the sense of the people of Florida.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. I present the petition of Jane M. Spooner and others, of Ohio, praying that women may have equal protection with colored men in the exercise of the right to vote, which I am requested by Miss Anthony to present to the Senate. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I present also a petition of the same character, the signatures to which appear to be all in the same handwriting; but there is this attestation to it, which I hope will make it pass also. At the end of it is this note:

SEVENTEENTH WARD, CINCINNATI, Friday, March 31.

DEAR MADAM: I send inclosed, I believe, all the names that can be secured in this ward. If any more can be had I will forward them.

Wishing success to the cause, I am, respectfully,

AMANDA GLENN.

Mrs. GRIFFING.

I hope that verification will make that petition pass likewise. [Laughter.] I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON presented additional papers in regard to the claim of Silas I. Feild and the heirs of the late Samuel F. Dalley, of the city of Little Rock, State of Arkansas, for a release from liability on the official bond of the late John G. Halliburton; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented additional papers in support of the application of George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Alexander Henderson be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Almira H. Thompson be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Elizabeth O'Neil, for arrears and increase of pension, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Robert Spaugh be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was Ordered, That R. Steinback have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in relation to the Point San José military reservation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now move for an order allowing George W. Jones, of Cincinnati, Ohio, to withdraw from the files his papers which were before the Committee on Claims at the last Congress, asking compensation under his contract for furnishing clothing to the Army. There was an adverse report, and I ask that the papers be withdrawn, on leaving copies on the files.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that an order be made to allow Judge Moore, of Washington, to withdraw two private letters from the papers referred this morning in the case of Feild and Dalley. These letters were put there by mistake, and I ask that Judge Moore have leave to withdraw them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Ann Daniel, of Yorkshire, England, praying for an increase of pension for her son, Major John Townsend Daniel, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Wilson, private in Company F, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Dr. Samuel Davis, late surgeon of the Eighty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying for an increase of pension from twenty-five dollars to fifty dollars a month, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. John McMurray, of Carlisle, Pennsylvania, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 291) to create a port of delivery at Jefferson, Texas, reported it adversely; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SPENCER. I am also directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 87) to facilitate the execution of and to protect certain public works of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River, to report the same back with several amendments; and I am directed by the committee to ask the immediate consideration of the bill.

The bill and amendments were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think this is too important a measure to be acted on at present. I therefore object. I suggest that the bill and amendments be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator will not object, for it is really important for the work that is now in progress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill go over until to-morrow and be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to have an opportunity of examining it more closely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over, objection being made.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Calvin Hess, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles S. Movers and Jane A. Movers, praying for a pension for services rendered in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that that go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is only an adverse report on the petition; there is no bill to go on the Calendar.

Mr. OGLESBY. We only report back the petition and papers, and ask to be discharged from their further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Edward Marshall, late of Company E, Fifteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report back the bill (S. No. 280) granting a pension to Thomas Reilly, late a private in Company H, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, adversely, and to ask that the petitioner be allowed to withdraw his papers, as on application at the Pension Office it appears that his claim is still pending there waiting for such testimony as would be sufficient there, and such testimony we should require here before passing his claim. Therefore it is unnecessary to act further upon it.

The bill was postponed indefinitely, and leave was granted to withdraw the petition and papers.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 83) granting a pension to Josiah Brivard, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 257) granting a pension to Eliza Shelton, Nancy Shelton, Cerena Metcalf, Nancy King, Patsey J. Shelton, Sarah Metcalf, Cloa Shelton, and Mary Franklin, and their children under the age of sixteen years, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension, reported a bill (S. No. 361) granting a pension to Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. NORWOOD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 298) to increase the pension of Harriet DeWitt Mitchell, invalid daughter of the late General O. M. Mitchell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin H. Shepherd, late chaplain of the Seventeenth Regiment of the United States Colored Troops, praying to be allowed a pension, reported adversely thereon; and the committee were discharged from its further consideration.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles J. Hanson, praying for an increase of pension in the nature of arrearages, reported adversely thereon; and the committee were discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Parker, a citizen of the State of Maine, (late the wife of Daniel McLaughlin,) praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution making it unlawful for the Congressional Printer to print any speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD not actually delivered in the Senate or House of Representatives, have instructed me to report the same back without amendment and recommend its passage, and also to ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That it shall not be lawful for the Congressional Printer to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any speech, or portion of a speech, not actually delivered in the Senate or in the House of Representatives.

FIRE-EXTINGUISHERS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1218) to provide for the purchase of fire-extinguishers for the Capitol building, to report it back without amendment, and ask that it be considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in co-operation with the architect of the Capitol, to purchase not exceeding eight fire-extinguishers, to be placed in those parts of the building and those rooms most exposed to danger from fire, the purchase to be made after a proper test of the merits of the extinguishers offered shall have been made, and payment therefor to be made out of the contingent funds of the respective Houses.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire merely to say that Senators are all, perhaps, aware that the roofs of the old Hall of the House of Representatives and the old Senate Chamber, now the Supreme Court room, were constructed of wood; and if the condition of the Treasury permitted the expenditure of so large a sum at the present time, I should favor the removal of these wooden parts to be replaced by iron, and thus make this building fire-proof. But at the present time it is possible that these extinguishers might be of some service in case of accidental fire. The upper lofts are filled with books and documents, and therefore are of a very combustible nature, and it is possible that in case of a fire these extinguishers, which will cost but a very small sum, might be of some service; but the only real security we can ever have is to remove these wooden structures and replace them by something that will be fire-proof. I hope the bill will be passed at once.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report another bill; and I ask for its present consideration. I think it will commend itself to the judgment of the Senate.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 360) making appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives in procuring a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and the employment of Frederick Law Olmsted, of New York, in furnishing plans for laying out, improving, and inclosing the same.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It will be conceded that this is a matter of some considerable importance. We have enlarged the grounds, and it is now proper that they shall also be laid out, so that there shall be some unity of design both on the east and west fronts. It is impossible that any plan can be made out until an accurate topographical survey shall be made of the grounds—their elevation, the position of every tree, and the walks, and all about them. I suppose it is also desirable that we should have the best artistic talent in the country to furnish proper plans; and I know of no person who is superior to Mr. Olmsted, of New York, who had the charge of the Central Park of that city. While I suppose it may not, perhaps, cost over $2,500, yet the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have inserted $5,000, in order to cover all possible expense, and possibly to continue Mr. Olmsted, if it should finally be decided, after plans have been made and approved by Congress, to employ him to superintend their execution.

Mr. SUMNER. I will ask the Senator whether the committee have come to any conclusion with regard to the trees?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No, sir; the committee propose to leave the subject with whoever may be employed to lay out the grounds. On conversing with Mr. Olmsted, (and I may say that I invited him here to look over the grounds, and he spent a couple of days upon the grounds,) he thinks that all the trees it will be necessary to preserve can easily be preserved either by removal or by sinking them on the ground where they stand. That is a matter that will come up after the plans shall have been made and submitted to Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the committee will act courageously with regard to those trees. I know the saying, "Woodman, spare that tree," and I certainly should not touch a tree except with hesitation and caution; but still I take it that in architecture and in the grounds that surround a great public structure it is now settled from experience and the rules of taste that trees are not advisable—they are not in place. When we have spent immense sums to rear an edifice with an architectural front, we should not place trees between that front and the traveler or the spectator; all should be exposed. Trees, therefore, as a general rule, in a street, are hardly in place; but certainly they are out of place in the neighborhood of a great public monument, which should be exposed to the gaze of all. Trees have been allowed to grow about the Capitol on the east side and also on the side toward Pennsylvania avenue, by which the view of the Capitol is seriously obstructed. I think that now is the time when the subject should be carefully considered, and those trees, if not entirely removed, at least so thinned out as not essentially to interfere with the sight of one of the most magnificent structures of the globe, for that I hold this national Capitol to be.

There is one tree, however, in the grounds opposite the Capitol on the east that must at any cost be spared. It is a beautiful beech, not an American beech, but I believe a classical beech; and there it is, to my mind, a thing of perfect beauty. When it is clothed in all its foliage during the summer I know of nothing in the District of Columbia that is equal to it in beauty. It is distinctly seen from the marble steps that conduct to the Senate Chamber; and I hope my friend will see to it that that tree does not suffer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is entirely premature to discuss these matters now, for it is only proposed to have some plan by which the public grounds shall be appropriately laid out. While there might be some difference of opinion on the subject as to how and in what way they should be laid out, it is true that there are many trees in the public grounds that ought to be taken out. I suppose nearly one-third of the trees have become unhealthy by being too thickly planted, and there were some trees originally planted that are no longer things of beauty—the poplars or whitewood, and some of the sycamores. But that question is not raised now; and I take it there will be no objection to the passage of this bill proposing to employ such a man as Mr. Olmsted. I will not consume any further time of the Senate in explaining it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am requested by the mayor and common council of the city of Fort Smith, Arkansas, to present a bill, which I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce and have referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 362) donating the military reservation of Fort Smith to the city of Fort Smith, Arkansas, for free schools; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 363) to provide for the payment of money due to the heirs of Joshua Hill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 364) to provide for the further improvement of the Great Kanawha River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

INTERSTATE RAILROADS.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board be instructed to consider and report a bill creating a commission of five eminent and skilled persons, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall examine and make report to Congress what legislation is necessary and practicable in regard to interstate railroads, to promote the following objects: The speedy transportation at reasonable rates of freight and passengers; the safety and comfort of passengers, by providing for the inspection of bridges, tracks, locomotives, and cars; and the reform of any abuses that may exist in consequence of extortion or unjust discriminations in the transportation of freights and passengers; and, in general, what regulations are necessary to promote the efficiency of railroads, the interests of commerce, and the convenience and safety of the traveling public.

I ask to have the resolution laid on the table and printed, and I will on next Tuesday morning, if it suits the convenience of the Senate, desire a short time to express my views as to the extent and scope of the power of Congress over this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the expediency of suspending the expenditure of all appropriations for public buildings not yet commenced, and covering such appropriations into the Treasury.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to occupy a few moments of the morning hour in making what is termed in the Senate, I believe, a personal explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks leave to make a personal explanation. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. I send to the desk a copy of the Boston Daily Advertiser of January 19, and I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A Warm Dispute.—Senator CLAYTON and the Postmaster-General had a very pointed controversy yesterday. The former called to request that a free delivery might be ordered for Little Rock. Mr. Creswell informed the Senator that that could not be done, because the population was much less than the law required. Mr. CLAYTON proceeded to indicate that he did not think the law need stand in the way, and demanded that it should be done without regard to the law. Mr. Creswell replied in very emphatic and pointed terms that he did not intend to violate the law, even when requested to do so by a United States Senator. Mr. CLAYTON did not accept this statement in a very lamb-like manner, but Mr. Creswell did not relent, and the Senator was obliged to abandon the field, first, however, expressing his opinion of the law and the Postmaster-General in a style somewhat peculiar to Arkansas.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, at first thought it would seem as though I ought not to notice this article; and yet, in view of the fact that I am charged, in plain and unmistakable terms, with having in my official capacity undertaken to influence a high officer of this Government to violate the law that he is called upon and sworn to enforce, and in view of the fact that this charge has been republished in several papers throughout the country, and re-embellished, I think it is due to my constituency, due to the Senate, due to myself, and due even to the press, that I should denounce, in unmistakable terms, that charge as being utterly false, and the instigator of it, whoever he may be, as being a falsifier and peddler of falsehoods.

Early in December last I carried, in person, to the Postmaster-General a written application, signed by my colleague, who, I regret to say, is absent to-day on account of sickness, and myself and my colleagues in the other House, setting forth that we believed that the city of Little Rock was entitled to the benefits of the free-delivery system, and asking the Postmaster-General to take the necessary steps in the premises. A day or two after I received the letter which I hold in my hand, and which it is unnecessary to read. In it the Postmaster-General, through his First Assistant, acknowledges the receipt of our communication, and says that he will send a special agent to Arkansas for the purpose of investigating the facts, and that the agent will probably be there early in January.

Last Saturday, about a month and eight days after this letter was sent to me, my colleague and myself called at the Post-Office Department to look after this matter. We were informed by the Postmaster-General that he had recalled the officer who was designated to make this necessary investigation, and that he would take no further steps in the matter until after the appropriation bill should be passed, and a new fiscal year commenced, which will be upon the 1st of July next.

The Postmaster-General did not in that or any other conversation express any opinion whatever as to whether the population of Little Rock justified the establishment of this system. Neither did I, directly or indirectly, at that time or any other, insist that this system should be applied to Little Rock in violation of law and without regard to the population. The only question of controversy that existed between the Postmaster-General and myself was upon this single question, whether he should proceed to investigate the question as to whether the city of Little Rock was entitled to the benefit of this free-delivery system, or whether he should wait until the commencement of the fiscal year and the proper appropriations were made. That was the only question of discussion betwixt us; and I did not say, as was stated in the Baltimore Sun, the day, I think, preceding the publication I have just had read, that I would see the Postmaster-General in a very warm place before I would vote for any appropriation for the Post-Office Department. I did say that under certain circumstances I would not favor any further appropriations for the free-delivery system, and I do not think that was out of keeping with some remarks I made a few days ago on this floor on that subject.

So far as any bad feeling between the Postmaster-General and myself of a personal nature is concerned, that is between him and me. We are amply able to settle those questions, and I will say we have settled them to the entire satisfaction of both parties. I only rise to disavow what is charged here, that I advised the violation of the law, or that I said I would not vote for the appropriations for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that a free press is one of the most powerful auxiliaries of a free government. I believe they ought to go hand in hand together. I believe also in the system of free schools. I am indebted in a great degree to the free schools of Pennsylvania for what little education I have. I have a very lively recollection of having received, on many occasions, the good old-fashioned chastisement for the violation of the discipline of the free school; and I have a still livelier recollection of having had laid across my shoulders, on divers occasions, the birch for offenses that I never committed, but, perhaps, were committed by the boys sitting alongside of me; and I will say, to the credit of one good old schoolmaster, that when I convinced him that he had done me injustice, he always seemed to be more sorry than I. Now, I believe that the rod these newspaper men hold is a very good thing in its way, and when they lay it upon the shoulders of men who have committed offenses, I say, "Lay on, Macduff;" but I do ask these gentlemen to be a little careful how they slash around indiscriminately. It is not a very pleasant thing for a man to have that rod laid across his shoulders for an offense he has not committed; and although I have on many occasions taken it and said nothing, I have resolved that hereafter when I have it laid across my shoulders for official offenses of which I may be innocent I will, when I deem it necessary, take this, the only means that I know of, to set myself right before the public.

AMENDMENTS CREATING POST-ROADS.

Mr. MORTON. I submit an amendment to the rules of the Senate, and ask to have it read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed rule, as follows:

That no amendment to any bill shall be in order for the creation of a post-road unless such amendment shall have previously been submitted to the consideration of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The proposed rule was refrred to the Select Committee on the Revision of the Rules, and ordered to be printed.

W. L. CABELL.

Mr. GORDON. I introduced a bill a few mornings ago for the removal of the political disabilities of William L. Cabell, a gentleman of Dallas, Texas, which I think was laid on the table. I should like to have action on that bill this morning, if the Senate has no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and has not been reported back.

REPORTING AND PRINTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the cost of reporting and printing the debates of Congress as the work is now being done; whether it was not more acceptably and economically done by the proprietors of the Globe; whether the permanent establishment of the work at the Government Printing Office will not involve large expenditures for facilities for its prosecution; and to report, by bill or otherwise, at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that that be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance.

[Mr. BOUTWELL addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I shall not occupy more than one minute by the watch. I did not want to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts, and I only rise now to put upon record some corrections as to facts in reference to the South.

The Senator spoke of the increased prosperity of the Southern States. I beg to refer to the fact that the whole argument which I had the honor to submit was based upon the declaration that the agricultural classes of the South, as well as of the whole country, were not in a prosperous condition. The Senator says that we are more prosperous than formerly. I must put upon record the fact that the cash value of the farms in Georgia in 1860 was over $157,000,000, and that in 1870 the cash value of the same farms was only $94,000,000. The value of the entire real estate of Georgia, including all the cities to which the Senator from Massachusetts referred as now in a most prosperous condition, is, by the statistics which I have before me, worth $53,000,000 less than it was in 1860. I admitted that the cities were more prosperous, and I could give a most excellent reason for that prosperity, and that very reason would sustain the position which I have taken in the argument. The reason of the prosperity of the cities of the South is the inability of the citizens of the country to support themselves upon their farms, and they have abandoned the country where they formerly resided and prospered to seek a livelihood in the cities; that is what has built up the cities; and notwithstanding the increased population and wealth of the cities, I state, by the statistics which lie before me, that the entire real estate of the State of Georgia (which is probably the most prosperous of all the cotton-growing States) is worth $53,000,000 less than it was in 1860.

The Senator referred to our increased productions. We raise about the same amount of cotton; but we formerly raised not only cotton but all the other products which we now buy from the West. In 1860 we raised in Georgia about 31,000,000 bushels of corn; in 1870 we raised only about half that amount, or, 17,500,000 bushels. In 1860 we raised about 2,000,000 head of hogs; in 1870 we raised 988,000 hogs. In 1860 we raised of rice, 52,507,000 bushels; in 1870 we raised of rice only 22,207,000—less than half. In 1860 we had in cattle, of all kinds, over 1,000,000 head; in 1870 we had only about 700,000.

Now, I submit to the Senate that these facts sustain the position upon which my entire argument has been built, that notwithstanding the prosperity of cities, notwithstanding the prosperity of all other interests in this country, under this financial system the agriculture of the country is absolutely prostrate.

I have nothing more to say. I let the facts speak for themselves. I am willing for the country to be the judge upon these facts which I submit now to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 22, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial and protests; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

A memorial of the general Indian council of the Indian territory, established under the treaties of 1866, praying the repeal of certain land grants made by Congress over the Indian country to certain railroad companies in 1866.

The protest of the general Indian council of the Indian territory, organized under treaties of 1866, against the establishment of a territorial government over the Indian territory without the consent of the Indians therein.

The protest of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole delegations of Indians, against the establishment by Congress of a territorial government in the Indian territory without the consent of the Indians, as provided in the treaties of 1866 and former treaties with these tribes.

FIRE-ESCAPES.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the national convention of chief engineers, held at Baltimore, in October in 1873, praying for a premium to be offered for a fire-escape and fire-ladder; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HALE, of New York, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 776) in aid of the public schools of the District of Columbia, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

STATEMENT OF MAJOR POWELL.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, presented the statement of Major J. W. Powell before the Committee on Indian Affairs January 13, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UNIFORM REGISTRY OF SEA-GOING VESSELS.

Mr. HOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1395) to establish a uniform registry of sea-going vessels, to afford additional protection to life on ship-board, and to govern rebates in duties on merchandise damaged on the voyage of importation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to state that I was detained from my seat in this House on yesterday by reason of indisposition. Had I been here I should have voted for the bill of my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] in reference to the centennial exposition.

GALENA RIVER, ILLINOIS.

Mr. BURCHARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to transmit to the House, at as early a day as practicable, a report of the engineers, and accompanying maps and papers, relative to the survey of Galena River, made in the year 1870 under his charge.

THOMAS J. M'INTIRE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Thomas J. McIntire, of Rowan County, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

J. M. ROANE.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1397) for the relief of J. M. Roane, of Macon County, North Carolina, for supplies furnished for the Indian service in California between the years 1856 and 1860; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 795) "making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered one and three, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered two, and agree to the same with the following amendment: add at the end of said Senate amendment the following: "Provided, That from and after the passage of this act a sum not exceeding $42,000 shall be paid for reporting the proceedings of each House of Congress for any one Congress, under the direction of the respective Houses; and all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES A. GARFIELD,
W. G. DONNAN,
W. S. HOLMAN,
Managers on the part of the House.
LOT M. MORRILL,
J. W. STEVENSON,
H. B. ANTHONY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there are any questions to be asked by any gentleman in regard to this report I will hear them before I call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I will first make a statement as to the scope of this report, after which I will yield to my colleague on the committee of conference, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The House will remember that when this bill was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, a statement was made that hitherto until the 4th of March last, the reporters of our debates were paid mainly by the parties that printed the Globe. Congress, however, paid them a part of their compensation. When the old Globe arrangement was broken up and the printing of the debates transferred to the Government Printing Office, it became necessary for Congress to take some action in regard to the status of the reporters. For that purpose, on the 3d of March last, a resolution was passed by the House declaring that the then Globe reporters should from that day forth be officers of the House, and should receive the same pay as was given by law to the Official Reporters of the House committees. Subsequently the pay of the House committee reporters and of the reporters of debates was raised in the last hours of the session by the bill that raised salaries generally. That made the pay of these reporters $5,037 a year each.

The Senate made a special arrangement of their own during the executive sesson of last spring, by which they agreed to pay their reporters by the piece, that is, so much per thousand ems, or so much a column, according to the amount of debates printed. When we last month sent to the Senate a bill appropriating money to pay our reporters from the 3d of March last to the end of the first year of this Congress, that is to the 3d of March next, the Senate added to it an appropriation to pay their reporters. When their amendment came here we found that there were two systems—one of a yearly salary, and one of pay by the piece, or amount. We disagreed to the amendment of the Senate, and asked for a committee of conference. The conference was held, and it was conceded that the House method of paying by salary was a wiser one than the Senate method of paying by the piece. We therefore determined to report a fixed amount, year by year, for the corps of reporters of each House by itself.

The next question was to fix that amount, and what it should be. Throwing off the increase made by the last session, not counting that special increase of salary, but taking the ordinary amount paid to the reporters of the two Houses, we found that for the last two Congresses it averaged about $44,500 for each House. And in view of the general desire and tendency to make as great a reduction of expenses as we could, we at last settled upon $42,000 for a Congress, each House to distribute that amount according to its own system, each House to make whatever arrangement it chose for the reporting of its debates, with the proviso that the total amount paid for the reporting of each House for a Congress should not exceed $42,000, being $21,000 a year for each House.

Now as we have five reporters of debates in this House, and they stand upon an equal footing as officers of the House, subject to appointment and removal by the Speaker under our rules, gentlemen may readily calculate what salary they will each receive. As a matter of fact it gives them a salary somewhat smaller than the salary now paid to our reporters of committees. But I may say that it is the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations to make such a change as shall reduce the salary of the reporters of committees to the same figures now proposed for the reporters of our debates.

Mr. STORM. Has the expense of reporting the debates in the other House been as great as in this House?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has. We found, what was curious enough, upon making an examination with reference to several Congresses past, that the space filled by the debates of the Senate was almost exactly the same as the space filled by the debates of the House. The reporters of both Houses agree that the space covered by the debates of each House is almost exactly the same. That surprised me, because the House being a larger body and holding longer daily sessions on an average, and generally being in session more days of the week, I had supposed the debates of the House would cover more space than the debates of the Senate. But, on the other hand, the Senate has had an extra session, an executive session, as it is called, of two or three or four weeks, which we do not have. That thrown in makes the amount of debates of each House just about the same, year by year.

Mr. SPEER. Does this bill increase or decrease the general amount of the expense?

Mr. GARFIELD. It decreases it by several thousand dollars for each House per Congress.

If gentlemen desire to ask any further questions I will hear them; but if not I will yield for a few moments to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I concurred in this report with some reluctance. My impression was that the amount proposed to be paid, according to this report, was somewhat beyond what the compensation of these gentlemen should be hereafter, based upon the amounts that have been paid during preceding years. I have not been inclined at all to diminish the salaries of the reporters below what might be considered reasonable, taking in view the skill and experience requisite to the proper performance of this duty, which is very important to both branches of Congress; but it does seem to me that $42,000 for a Congress is a large sum to appropriate for this purpose by each House. I find, however, that it is of the first importance that the amount to be paid to the reporters of the House and the Senate should be definitely fixed. Few gentlemen in this House or the Senate, perhaps, understood exactly the expense of this service. I have before me a statement which has been made to one of the gentleman of this committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN,] in which the somewhat remarkable fact is made to appear that Congress was actually paying in the form of extras and increased per cent. to the gentlemen who do the reporting in the House as well as in the Senate, perhaps more especially in the House, a sum very nearly equal to the amount paid by the contractors who published the Globe, Messrs. Rives & Bailey. For instance, during the Forty-second Congress, Rives & Bailey paid for reporting of the House $25,343.45, while the Government paid to the House reporters in the form of extras $24,668.69. For the first session of the last Congress the Government paid the reporters $2,500; for the second session $4,000, and for the third session the same amount. They also received 20 per cent. upon the whole amount received from the Government as well as from Rives & Bailey; and by the act of March 3, 1873—the salary-increasing act—they received $1,400 each, making $7,000 in the aggregate.

The House will see how this system operated. Almost all of us supposed that the gentlemen who were doing our reporting in the House were receiving from the Government only $800 each a year, to make them officers of the House. But in addition to this they received the further sums I have mentioned. Thus it became a matter of the first importance to settle definitely what the compensation should be.

One of the most annoying things connected with the public expenditures, arises from our inability to ascertain what the expenditures for salaries really are.

The whole amount paid both by the Government and the Globe for reporting the House proceedings for the last Congress, was $50,012.14. The amount paid for the Senate reporting was about the same; for it was ascertained, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has said, from Rives & Bailey, as well as from the reporters themselves, who are experts in this business, that the amount of reporting in the Senate for any given Congress, is about the same as the amount of reporting in the House.

This report proposes that the aggregate compensation for the reporters in each branch shall be fixed at $42,000 for the Congress—$21,000 a year. Gentlemen must not take it for granted that the whole of this sum goes to the reporters themselves. There are five gentlemen reporting for us in the House; in the Senate there are three reporters. It appears that the taking of the notes, although it requires the highest skill and experience, is not the most laborious part of this business; but the translation, the transcription, of these notes, is a most laborious task. The result is that the Senate reporters, being fewer in number, employ a larger number of assistants than do the House reporters. Although I have not been able to ascertain anything near the exact sum paid by the reporters of the House for this additional service, I have reached the conclusion that the sum does not vary materially from $1,000 a year for each reporter. So that practically we are fixing the salaries of the reporters of the House at about $3,000 a year.

Let me state, further, the theory upon which I have signed this report. I do not think that the compensation of the reporters should be below the average compensation paid to gentlemen who are employed in various positions of responsibility about this House. The work of reporting requires great skill and experience; and the tax which it imposes upon the intellectual powers of the reporters, as every gentleman can see, is very great. With their salary at $3,000 a year, their compensation will be about upon an average with other salaries since the repeal of the salary act. While I am well satisfied that the salaries of many of the officers connected with the House and the Senate are above what is reasonable, I think the salaries of the reporters should be put on a basis with other salaries, and that the reduction of pay should be uniform as applied to all. I am confident there will be no severe economy or retrenchment in the expenditures until we begin right here in the two branches of Congress, and that the vigor and decision of purpose necessary for a real reduction of salaries should induce us to begin with the salaries of ourselves and of these gentlemen with whom we are in daily intercourse and kindly relations. We have all learned to appreciate the courtesy as well as the ability of the reporters in this House, but this cannot justify a disregard of the public interests.

I make one other suggestion. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that while, so far as the reporters of the House are concerned, we make a reduction of a little over $8,000 for the Congress, that will not be a very important item when we consider the increased cost of this new system of publishing the debates of Congress. In the last Congress, one of the most sagacious gentlemen we have had on the floor of the House for many years, a gentleman actuated by a most earnest desire to promote public economy, Mr. Beatty, of Ohio, then chairman of the Committee on Printing for the House, stated that the transfer to the Government Printing Office of the business of publishing the debates in Congress would very materially diminish the expense of their publication. I am confident now that the gentleman to whom I have referred was very seriously mistaken in that impression. While it is impossible to state with accuracy at this time what the expense of reporting and publishing the debates for this Congress will be, I think I may say, proceeding on the data I have obtained, that we may expect a very heavy increase of the cost of publishing the debates.

It seems that publishing these debates should be left to private enterprise. It is not a matter of Government property. It is a matter really for private enterprise, and in which private enterprise will secure the performance of the work with a much greater degree of economy.

Increasing the duties of the Government printing establishment necessarily involves a large item of patronage. It is already a huge affair. I know it is difficult for gentlemen to relinquish this; we naturally desire to retain the agencies by which patronage is created; but I submit to the gentlemen who control this matter, that if the public interests are to be served, the Printing Committees of the House and of the Senate should by proper legislation devise some more economical plan for the publication of the congressional debates than that we are entering upon now. Unless we do this, I feel confident that we shall find year after year the expense of this comparatively unimportant matter, the publication of the congressional debates, growing upon us not gradually, but rapidly and heavily.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think I must resume the floor, having agreed to yield some time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the time will be sufficiently extended to allow the House to understand clearly the importance of checking this growing evil of expenditure for this particular work.

Mr. STORM. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] a question: whether now, inasmuch as the reporters have been made officers of this House, they receive any compensation in addition to that which they will receive under this bill as the Official Reporters of the debates.

Mr. HOLMAN. None whatever. The reporters of the House are receiving now a little over $50,000 for a congressional term by the action of the House at the close of last session. By this conference report the reporters of the House will receive $42,000 for each Congress, not for each year, but for each Congress in its two sessions; and the same amount will be paid for the Senate reporting.

Mr. STORM. I wish to know whether, from the 4th of March last to this time, the reporters have been receiving pay from the Congressional Printer, in addition to their pay as officers of the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. They have received nothing for the present year from the Congressional Printer. The contract with the proprietors of the Congressional Globe terminated with the 4th day of last March. From that day, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has explained, the reporters of the House have been entitled to the same compensation as our reporters for the committees, which was something over $5,000 a year; so that the amount appropriated by this bill from the 4th of March last to the 4th of March next would be, if this old arrangement continued to the 4th of March, a little over $25,000, or a little over $50,000 a Congress; while this report, if it becomes a law, will fix the amount at something over $8,000 less.

I know the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN,] chairman of the Printing Committee, whose familiarity with the subject is infinitely greater than mine, if he concurs with me in the opinion that our present system is going to be attended with a largely increased expenditure, will go earnestly to the task of reforming the evil.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield three minutes to my colleague on the conference committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN.]

Mr. DONNAN. I do not question for a moment that the Committee on Printing will receive as valuable any suggestions which may be made by the long-time member and economical member from Indiana. But, sir, the question as to the publication of the debates of Congress is not before us on this conference report. And I therefore, without further words, dismiss that subject until it comes properly before the House, as it will do in due course of time, when it comes to consider a resolution which has already been reported to the Committee on Printing, and is now under consideration by that committee.

I have only one word I wish to say on this conference report. I agree in the main with what has been stated by my colleagues on that committee. There is only one feature of the report with which I am not entirely satisfied, and that is this: I am not satisfied that the sum we have agreed to pay is the least sum upon which the reporting for this House can be properly done. But I disagree somewhat with my colleague from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that this is not a substantial reduction of the rates as heretofore existing. The last Congress paid for reporting its debates in either House a little upwards of $50,000. This is a reduction of upward of $8,000. We took off the 15 per cent. increase which accrued under the increased-salary act of March 3, 1873; and for the purpose of coming to an agreement we reduced it even a little below that, making a substantial reduction of a little over $8,000 for the reporting in either House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Six thousand dollars.

Mr. DONNAN. I have the figures, and if the gentleman will look at them he will see that I am right. The cost of the reporting of last Congress was a little over $50,000—in exact figures, $50,012.14.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DONNAN. We authorize only $42,000 for a Congress. The gentleman needs correction in another respect. The conference report does not fix the sum exactly at $42,000. It is only a sum not exceeding $42,000, and can be contracted for at less. The only change I would make in the conference report would be that this contract might be done with a head, with one responsible party; and in my judgment it might be done for a less sum than that which is named here. But we have made, as I have said, a reduction amounting to a little upward of $16,000 a Congress, counting both Houses. Therefore I cordially united with my colleagues in signing this report, believing if Congress goes into any substantial reduction in the expenditures it will be fair to bring the reporters of Congress into such reduction with all others. But it would be quite unfair to reduce them largely below the decrease we have made in respect to others by the repeal of the salary act. I believe the House and Congress will be substantially satisfied with the report, and will sustain it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before demanding the previous question I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to one point in this report from the committee of conference which it seems to me deserves notice. I understand practically this conference report gives the same sum to the two branches for their reporting. The reporters of the House are now the officers of the House. They are five in number. The reporters in the Senate, we are told, are only three in number.

Mr. RANDALL. There are five reporters in either House, as will be seen by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not so understand it. The Senate has three where we have five. If you count theirs at five (including two not constantly at the reporters' desk) you should count ours at seven.

Now, the labors of the reporters of the House are a great deal heavier and much more difficult. In the Senate they report long single speeches—written out very often by their authors—in a quiet body, composed of a small number of persons. The reporters of the House report in the midst of confusion, noise, and with a constant succession of speeches, with rapid interlocutory questions which so frequently take place here; and they have to discharge the most difficult duties which can be imposed upon any reporters, however skillful. This conference report really pays the officers of the House (which scrupulously and jealously maintains its equal dignity with the Senate in all respects) a less sum for so much greater and more difficult duty—more difficult and greater in the hours when the House is in session, and more difficult and greater when the House is not in session—than it pays to the reporters of the other branch. This report, then, to that extent is an acknowledgment of the inferiority of this body. Now, it may be a very little thing, yet it is a matter which this House has regarded as one of importance from the foundation of the Government. It has never permitted the principle to be recognized anywhere, that in the compensation of the officers of one branch—by which its dignity is measured in public estimation—there should be any inequality with the other branch.

It is a matter, therefore, in which the privileges of this body and the dignity of this House are concerned. I therefore suggest that this report should be committed to a new committee of conference, or recommitted to the same committee, if the Chair shall see fit to appoint the same members, so that that equality of privilege and dignity of the two Houses may be carefully guarded. I trust the House will not sanction nor accept a report by which a less compensation is paid officers of this House for severer and greater labors than similar officers of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to say one thing in this connection.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The facts submitted to the committee of conference, both by Messrs. Rives & Bailey and by the reporters of the House and the reporters of the Senate, were to the effect that the amount of labor in each House was about the same.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But we all know better, that it cannot be the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentlemen who know the best do not agree with my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] The reporters of the House say that the labor is about the same in amount; that the reporting is about the same.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Who would believe, on anybody's statement, that it is as easy to report the colloquy which is now going on between the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and myself as it is to report one of the ordinary—I will not say sleepy—speeches that occur in the other body?

Mr. HOLMAN. We all know——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not yield any further. The gentleman can see for himself that the reporter now taking notes is so much interested in the wit and brilliancy of my friend that he cannot attend to his duties half the time. [Laughter.] No such thing as that occurs in the other body.

Mr. DONNAN. Allow me to say one thing more.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Permit me to answer the gentleman from Indiana.

This report of the committee of conference, providing for placing under the control of this House, for the payment of five or seven of its officers, according as you count or do not count the subordinates, the same sum that is placed in the hands of the Senate for the payment of three or five similar officers of the House, is the first step in a direction which the House has always jealously guarded against of recognizing a superior dignity on the part of the Senate and of not maintaining an equality of dignity between the two branches, in the payment of its officers. It is very easy to vote down this conference report and have another conference committee, composed of the same persons if you please, who will guard the dignity of the House on this particular point. I do not know that there is any difficulty in that, and certainly nothing will be lost by doing it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a single word before calling the previous question.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has made a very clear and satisfactory speech, with every word of which I agree, except as to his facts. His argument is unanswerable; he is simply mistaken in his facts. He says it is wrong for us to put the officers of the House on a ground inferior to similar officers of the Senate. My answer to him is this: it is acknowledged by experts that the amount of work is substantially the same in the two Houses; that it covers the same space. The reporters of both Houses admit that. The difference is that the reporting in this House is more difficult to do than the reporting in the Senate.

There are five reporters to do the work of the Senate, as may be seen by reference to the Congressional Directory, and there are also five reporters to do the work in the House; but we have in this House two reporters in addition, as reporters of proceedings of committees. The Senate have no officers corresponding with them, and in that respect the two Houses are not parallel, unless the difference is made up by the larger number of committee clerks which the Senate has. We pay to these two reporters for committees a distinct salary, outside of the salaries embraced in this report. The salaries we pay them have nothing to do with this report. Our dignity is saved in this report, and in the extra pay of two persons as committee reporters outside of these reporters of debates. There is, therefore, no inequality between the two Houses either in the compensation or the number of persons employed to report our debates.

It is not by any means true, as it ought to be, that the corresponding officers of the two Houses are all paid alike. That was the only thoroughly sound thing that we accomplished last winter by the very much abused salary bill. In that bill we equalized the pay of the officers of the two Houses, by putting some down and putting others up; we did equalize their pay. That bill having been repealed, the officers of the two Houses are now very unequal in salary. In that respect I agree with my friend from Massachusetts that it is unjust to the House that its officers should be paid a lower rate of compensation than is paid to similar officers of the Senate. But that objection does not apply to this case at all.

Now, one word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] He says there was less paid to these reporters of debates under the Rives & Bailey arrangement than we are to pay them now. I believe that is true as regards some years. But it is not true that under the Rives & Bailey arrangement we paid less for the reporting of our debates than we will now pay under this arrangement. For instance, Congress increased the compensation of Rives & Bailey for reporting from $7.50 to $10.30 per column, and we paid them that increase; but these reporters here did not get any of the increase. The contractors, as I understand, got an increased profit for reporting, but they did not give any of the increase to the reporters. We propose now that whatever they earn shall be paid directly to them.

Mr. DONNAN. I wish to add one single remark. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] seems to have forgotten entirely that the Senate has an executive session of three or four or six weeks, while we have no such thing; and that therefore, to that extent, additional reporting is done by the reporters of the Senate. That seems to have been entirely left out of consideration by the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to say but a few words. I regret that this matter of reporting our debates has been brought forward as a separate measure. I had been greatly in hopes that the Committee on Printing would have brought forward some proposition in regard to the reporting and publishing the debates of the two Houses which should be more satisfactory to the country generally and to the members of the two Houses than is the present arrangement. I refer, in one respect, to the matter of convenience to the members of Congress, a matter which I think should be considered in reference to a very large number of them. The place of publication should be located somewhere at a more convenient point than it now is.

In the olden time we could stop in at the Globe office upon the avenue and look at the proof of our speeches, or revise the manuscript. All the arrangements were convenient. Now the place of publication is nearly a quarter of a mile away from this House, is in a great degree inaccessible, and it is with great difficulty that we can superintend the printing of the remarks we may make.

Besides, instead of having a newspaper placed on our desks every morning, as we used to have, and as I think we still ought to have, under whatever form and under whatever arrangements the publication of debates may be made, we have placed before us part of a book which no gentleman feels inclined to read unless he has ample time.

I wish to say that unless something better can be devised I shall insist upon separating this work from the Government entirely, leaving the publication to be made by private enterprise, under some arrangements which may divest it entirely of anything like an official character. I believe that is the way the debates of the British Parliament are published; and I am not sure but that it is the way the work ought to be done here. At all events I should prefer that experiment to the present arrangement. Therefore I cannot support a report like this, which only covers a portion of the ground, when I think the whole subject should be considered together.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will allow me to confirm one statement which I made as applied to our reporters, and which I understood him to controvert. I am authorized to say that it is much harder to report in this branch than in the other, and that many a person who might make a high reputation in the Senate as a reporter would break down and fail completely in this body. The gentleman from Ohio seemed to question the correctness of my statement; and I understood him to say that the reporters did not say so.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman mistakes me. I did not question the correctness of that particular statement; I have no doubt it is entirely true. My remark applied only to the amount of reporting done in the two bodies; I said that the amount of reporting in the two Houses covered about the same space.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. O, I have no doubt that the Senators are as long-winded as we are. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I admit that this is a vastly more difficult place in which to report than the Senate.

Just at this point I will make one other remark in answer to the suggestion which has been made here, that this work might be let out by contract and could perhaps under that system be done more cheaply than it is now. Yes, sir; I presume—indeed I have no doubt—that we could let out this work by contract to reporters who would do it, or try to do it, very much more cheaply than it is now done; but I am satisfied that among the reporters throughout the country who may be able to report ordinary speeches you cannot find one in a hundred who, coming into this turbulent body, could comprehend the run of its business, and the intricacy of its parliamentary questions, or could follow the excited and rapid colloquies frequently taking place on this floor, well enough to maintain himself successfully as a reporter in this House.

I demand the previous question on agreeing to the report.

Mr. NIBLACK. I say it may be well to let private enterprise come in here and do the reporting.

The previous question was seconded; there being—ayes 77, noes not counted.

The main question was ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the report, it was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at eight minutes before one o'clock, and the call of committees will proceed.

JOHN DOLD.

Mr. WALDRON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 764) for the relief of John Dold, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX ON MATCHES AND BANK CHECKS.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 262) to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches, and the bill (H. R. No. 168) to repeal all stamp taxation on bank checks and friction matches. I propose to move that these adverse reports be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order for next Wednesday at three o'clock. I will state my reason for making this motion. These bills propose to repeal taxes that have yielded to the Government within the last year $3,600,000. There is a strong desire in the community that this repeal shall take place. The business affected by the taxes, especially the manufacture of matches, has in consequence of the tax gone entirely into the hands of very large dealers. The small manufacturers of matches have, from the necessity of the case, been crushed out. There is, therefore, a very strong desire to effect the repeal of that tax.

The Committee on Ways and Means, in the revision of the tariff at the last Congress, reported a proposition for the repeal of this tax, and the proposition was agreed to by both Houses; but at the last moment, there being an apprehension (which subsequent events have confirmed) that there was a greater reduction in that bill than the exigencies of the Government would permit, the provision for the repeal of the tax on matches was struck out in the committee of conference; and that action, as I happen to know, very much gratified the men who paid the tax, for the reason which I have stated.

In the present condition of the Treasury the question of this repeal opens up the general question as to the necessities of the national Treasury and the methods of meeting those necessities.

It is evident, sir, that discussion cannot go on in the morning hour, and the only practical method of entering deliberately on that discussion is to refer this adverse report to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make it a special assignment. Ordinarily an adverse report goes upon the table sub silentio. I submit it, therefore, to the House. I have another bill which I propose to report, and ask the House to take the same reference. I propose, therefore, that this adverse report be made a special order in the Committee of the Whole on next Wednesday at three o'clock. Of course, that must follow, and not supersede, any previous standing orders of the Committee on Appropriations. I must take my chance as to that.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that the gentleman proposes to refer this adverse report on matches only?

Mr. DAWES. On matches and stamps generally.

Mr. COX. Does not that open up the whole subject of taxation?

Mr. DAWES. It opens up necessarily the whole question of taxes, whether the Treasury will bear this reduction, whether this burden cannot be transferred elsewhere, or whether there is any necessity or propriety of continuing or repealing its taxes. I do not see how the question of this tax can be discussed without opening up the entire question. In the Committee of the Whole of course there is greater freedom of discussion; and I do not desire to keep in the morning hour, as necessarily I should, representing the committee on this subject, for several days. I propose, therefore, the question be referred to the Committee of the Whole, where it will be open to discussion.

Mr. SPEER. Is the Committee on Ways and Means unanimous in this adverse report which the gentleman makes?

Mr. DAWES. If my recollection serves me, they are unanimous in this report. I do not remember exactly, but the committee, I will say, have the same feeling as the committee of the last Congress—that it is a vexatious tax, that it is a tax which tends to put all manufacture of matches into the hands of monopolists, and if the Treasury would permit it they would gladly relieve that industry from this burden.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he is opposed to discussion generally when we are in Committee of the Whole? Will he allow to be opened up on this discussion the question as to whether we shall exhaust our reserve of $44,000,000 in favor of inflation?

Mr. DAWES. I have a bill in my hand which will be apt to raise that question.

Mr. COX. Why not refer it with this?

Mr. DAWES. You cannot do everything at once. I said a moment ago I had another bill in my hand which I would propose to take the same reference.

Mr. COX. That answers my question more pertinently than courteously.

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon for the apparent curtness of my reply. I will now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] for five minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. Does not that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. All bills relating to appropriations of money and to the imposition of taxes, under the rules, must have their first discussion in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MONROE. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to give me five minutes because I have introduced some of these bills in behalf of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes no objection; but all bills relating to appropriations of money out of the Treasury, or imposition of taxes, must, under the rule, have their first discussion in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to make a brief statement. I do not hear any objection.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is it open for discussion in the House when we propose to send it to the committee?

Mr. MONROE. I was about to say the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] offered me five minutes for the reason that on different occasions, at the request of a large number of my constituents, I introduced bills for the repeal of the stamp tax on matches.

What are some of the considerations in favor of this repeal?

In the first place, the repeal of this tax was earnestly demanded by large bodies of the people, because they believed it to be very nearly of the character of a tax on the necessaries of life. We all know, and those in humble circumstances of life know much better than many persons on this floor, how literally true it is that taxes are a necessary of life, almost as much as food or clothing.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman means matches. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONROE. Well, sir, we have become so accustomed to taxes, that perhaps it was a pardonable mistake if I did become a little confused and almost supposed taxes themselves were a necessary of life. [Laughter.] But I did mean to say that matches were a necessary of life. Every poor sewing-woman who buys her bunch of a hundred matches gives one cent to the manufacturer and one cent to the Government; so that on this account it would be desirable to repeal this tax.

But in the next place we all agree that it is a most important thing for the general welfare that the manufacturing business of the country should be as widely diffused as possible. It is desirable that our manufactures should not all be accumulated at great centers, but that they should be diffused over the whole land. It is desirable for the general welfare that every country town, if possible, should have some interest in this question of manufactures. Now, sir, this was largely the case in regard to matches before the stamp tax was laid upon them. The country town had its small manufactory of this kind. But the result of the stamp tax upon matches has been to accumulate the whole business in the hands of a few great capitalists. And why? Because the Treasury Department allows a large percentage of reduction to those capitalists who take a large amount of stamps at once. I cannot give the exact figures at this moment, but I know that capitalists are granted a reduction of 5 per cent. or 10 per cent.; and I believe that every large manufacturer of matches, who is willing to have dies prepared at the Treasury at his own expense, which is only a few hundred dollars, so as to use a private trade-mark, is allowed a further reduction of 5 per cent. on the amount of stamps he obtains. And to my certain knowledge some of the great capitalists of the country, who are engaged in this business, make enough in the course of the year, by the percentage of reduction on account of the amount of stamps they buy, to make a moderate fortune—what would be considered a handsome fortune by many of our people. And it is because the present law is making a tremendous monopoly of this thing, and because it is destroying and breaking down all the small manufactories which are distributed through the country, that my constituents desire its repeal. I appreciate the difficulties in the way of reducing taxation which the Committee on Ways and Means have to encounter, but I suggest that this tax might be removed from matches and imposed upon some other interest, where it would be borne by the wealth of the country and not by the great body of the people.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on my right [Mr. MYERS] introduced the first bill for a repeal of the tax on matches. I move that both bills be referred to a Committee of the Whole and made the special order for Wednesday next, at three o'clock, and thereafter from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. SPEER. How many bills for this repeal were there before the committee?

Mr. DAWES. Three or four.

Mr. SPEER. I thought there had been three or four dozen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that these two bills, the bill to repeal the stamp duty or tax on matches and the bill to repeal all taxation on bank checks and friction matches, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Wednesday next, at three o'clock, and thereafter at the same hour from day to day until disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman except all orders of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. DAWES. All previous orders.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should like him to except all appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. Very well.

Mr. MAYNARD. Without desiring to antagonize the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would suggest that if the order be made in those terms it will interfere very seriously with the business of another committee, of which I am a member.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware that the gentleman from Tennessee represents a committee whose jurisdiction and that of the committee which I represent are very conflicting. I trust, however, that he and I, in the arrangement of the business, will not be found antagonizing each other; and I give him my word that any proper request he may make will receive every consideration from our committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not allude to any antagonism of jurisdiction; but if that order be made, and if we start the debate on this match and bank-check proposition, we may find it running into an infinity of other matters.

Mr. DAWES. Although that will be the order for consideration in the Committee of the Whole, if I should be unreasonable about it, the House could take care of that by instructing the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish merely to make the suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. I shall give it every consideration.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is, that these two bills shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and made the special order for Wednesday next at three o'clock, and thereafter, at the same hour, from day to day until disposed of; but not to interfere with special orders for appropriation bills now in committee or hereafter to be referred.

There was no objection; and the order was made.

LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1398) to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed to ask that the same disposition be made of this bill. And I wish to say in reference to it that when it comes up for discussion the Committee on Ways and Means hope to be able to make it the basis of a specific measure, that will embrace not only the limitation of the legal-tender notes, but will also more particularly provide for a supply of the Treasury for any present pressing exigency, and will also provide such means as they may feel important and necessary to maintain the pledge of the Government to do all in their power that will tend toward specie payment. I ask that the same disposition be made of the bill.

Mr. MERRIAM. When this subject comes up for discussion will it be open to debate at any length?

Mr. DAWES. I think that by making it the special order in Committee of the Whole we will secure the largest measure of debate that is possible under the rules of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read. The preamble states that the existing uncertainty as to whether the amount of legal-tender notes now authorized by law to be kept in general circulation is $356,000,000 or $400,000,000 is calculated to derange the business of the country and to unsettle values. The bill therefore provides that the provisions of law existing prior to the passage of the act approved April 12, 1866, entitled "An act to amend an act to provide ways and means to support the Government, approved March 3, 1865," may be declared to be in force, so as to authorize legal-tender notes of the United States to the amount of $400,000,000 to be kept in general circulation, and that the total amount of United States notes issued, or to be issued, shall never exceed that sum.

Mr. BECK. I hope that bill will be printed.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly; I include that in my motion. I move that this bill be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order at the same time with the other bills just reported, and under the same conditions.

Mr. COBURN. Some of us did not hear what those conditions were, and would like to hear them again stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts had better name a day later than the one for the other bills.

Mr. DAWES. I will do so, and will name Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is, that this bill be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order for Thursday next, at three o'clock, and from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with appropriation bills heretofore assigned or hereafter to be reported.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who is the author of this bill, desires to say a few words in regard to it, and I yield to him.

Mr. BECK. What I desire to say is this: I think the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] and other members of the committee differ a little as to what they expect to do with this bill. Some of the members of the committee desire to make it a part of a general plan. Other members, of whom I am one, desire, as an independent proposition, to fix the volume of the legal-tender currency as a starting point for other legislation, or at least independent of it. Those who agree with me are afraid to involve this question with other measures that may take weeks or months for discussion and consideration in this House, and perhaps weeks or months for discussion and consideration in the Senate, during all of which time the question whether $356,000,000 or $400,000,000 is the legal volume of the currency remains at the option, or, if you please, the caprice, of the Secretary of the Treasury, thereby deranging values, and preventing the people of the country from carrying on their business with any security or fixed idea of what the volume of the currency is; causing them to deal in constant apprehension of the contraction or expansion which it may suit the Secretary to make to the extent of $44,000,000. In other words, as a starting point, either for the Committee on Banking and Currency to determine how the currency of the country shall be distributed, or under what system of banking business shall be carried on, or for the Committee on Ways and Means to determine what taxes, if any, are necessary or what loans, if any, shall be had, we must know what the present volume of the legal-tender currency is. No gentleman can rise on this floor and assert either that the currency is $356,000,000 or $400,000,000 without being contradicted by some gentleman who is equally as intelligent as himself. If I were now to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means what is the legal amount of currency, and he should answer, as I believe he would, that it was $356,000,000, other gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means would rise and contradict his statement; and the same is true as to the members of all the other committees who have to deal with the monetary affairs of the people. While this state of things exists there can be no intelligent legislation on financial subjects.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it would be right to other members who have business to bring before the House to enter into any general discussion upon this bill at this time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know why the gentleman from Massachusetts should undertake to occupy all the time of the House, and to interrupt everybody else, whether he has the right or not.

What I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky is this: he says that there is now a doubt as to the amount of legal money in circulation. If we should pass this bill to-day, and declare that there should be at any one time only $400,000,000 of legal-tenders in circulation—that it should not be legal to have in circulation any greater sum—would that make the matter any clearer; or would not some gentleman on the floor say the law was not complied with? I cannot see that even if we pass a law declaring the amount to be $400,000,000 we would make that amount the actual amount in circulation.

Mr. BECK. Let me answer the gentleman. Until the law of April, 1866, was passed, which authorized a contraction of $10,000,000 in the first six months, by permitting legal-tender notes to be retired and canceled, and $4,000,000 per month, hereafter, which continued under Mr. McCulloch's administration until the law passed in February, 1868, when Congress stopped the further reduction at a point when the currency was $365,000,000—before the passage of that law of 1866, I repeat, no doubt ever arose in the mind of anybody in the country that $400,000,000 was the amount of currency legally in circulation, and no Secretary ever supposed that he had the right to contract it or withdraw any of it from circulation. We now propose to restore the currency to the point at which it stood prior to the law of 1866. The difficulty arose out of the Secretary of the Treasury, backed by the opinion of the Treasurer of the United States, in violation of law in my opinion, but as I believe honestly, or at least urged to it by necessity, claiming that the amount of currency is now legally $400,000,000. He claims that the difference between $365,000,000 and $400,000,000 is a reserve—that is the language used in the book printed and circulated by the Secretary—a reserve in the hands of the Secretary, to be used by him as the exigencies of the Department may require. It is in no sense a reserve. The currency is to-day legally either $356,000,000 or $400,000,000, and the Secretary cannot legally make it any other amount.

Mr. BURCHARD. I must object to any discussion of a resolution of this kind. I do not understand what is the object of the gentleman.

Mr. BECK. I will state it in one word. The object is to protest against mixing up this question with any other, and to show to the House that in fact there is now at least $381,000,000 in circulation; and I desire to express the belief that when it is certain that either $356,000,000 or $400,000,000 is the sum limited by law, and ought to be so declared, a contraction of $25,000,000, to bring it back to $356,000,000, would be very injurious to the interests of the country at this time. So believing, I contend that it would be better to issue the other $19,000,000, and fix the amount at $400,000,000, putting any change beyond the power of the Secretary, than it would be to contract it to $356,000,000 so soon after the crisis the country has just gone through, especially as by so doing we may avoid additional taxation or increase of the interest-bearing debt. I agree that it would be better to make it $356,000,000 than to leave it as it is, to be one thing one day and another thing the next. It will be observed that the bill carefully avoids any expression of opinion as to whether the action of the Secretary was legal or not. I believe it is illegal; others think differently. I want to avoid discussion of that, and agree as to the future policy to be pursued. One thing is clear, whether right or wrong, the volume of currency now in circulation being $381,000,000, to contract it $25,000,000 would be ruinous. Therefore let us fix it as it stood before the law whose construction and effect we differ about was passed. I think we can all agree that it would be better to take the matter entirely out of the power of the Secretary and settle it by definite law.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BECK. I have no time to answer anybody. One word more. I want to say only this, that I hope the House will insist upon keeping this matter separate from all other questions of banking and currency or inflation or contraction, and settle the question in such a manner that the people of the country shall know, in all their business transactions, that $400,000,000 is the amount of legal-tender currency; or if the House will not do that, then let it be fixed at $356,000,000; but let this question be kept separate and apart from all other business; let it be settled upon a definite, distinct basis.

Mr. DAWES. It would have conformed to the wishes of the committee if members of the committee had refrained from expressing their views at this time; they would have preferred that their own views in reference to this whole matter should be expressed when the case shall come up for general discussion.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I failed to understand, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] presented this measure, whether it received a favorable report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. I will state that this is a unanimous report. While, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has stated, there was some division in the committee as to whether this should be presented as a separate measure, I may be permitted to say (if it be allowable to state what transpired in the committee) that, without exception, the committee agreed to the substance of this report.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish distinctly to disavow any small jealousy that might possibly be inferred on the part of my committee upon the question of jurisdiction. While this subject is one that must necessarily be considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, it may very properly come within the province of the Committee on Ways and Means; or this measure might properly have come from the Committee on the Judiciary with the view of giving a construction to existing law. It might also have come, not improperly, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws. But the proposition involved connects itself necessarily with the question of the currency; and I submit to the gentleman whether he does not think it would be better so to arrange that it may be considered in connection with such measure of policy as the Committee on Banking and Currency shall be able to present to the House for consideration, and whether some understanding to that effect might not be had before fixing the time for the discussion.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] I wish to say that some embarrassment was experienced, not only by myself, but by the whole committee, in respect to the matter to which he alludes. If this bill proposed to give a construction to existing laws I should consider it as belonging to the Committee on the Judiciary. If it presented solely a question of regulating the currency, I should regard it as belonging exclusively to the Committee on Banking and Currency. But I have already expressed the hope that we might be able to connect it more than it necessarily is with some measures for meeting the necessities of the Government. I know how intimately connected the two questions are. While the legal-tender circulation of the country is currency, it is also a debt of the Government; and whether that debt shall go on increasing or shall be diminished, is a question properly coming within the province of the committee which I represent. We, however, considered the question whether we should not confer with the gentleman's committee. I assure the gentleman that there is no disposition on the part of our committee to take from his committee the jurisdiction that belongs to it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is this discussion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then I object to it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is not enlightening any one, nor is he willing to take a suggestion from anybody.

Mr. DAWES. After the very polite remark of the gentleman from Wisconsin I will not further discuss the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, but will simply express the hope that a vote may now be taken.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me one word?

Mr. DAWES. I should be exceedingly happy to yield to my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] but for the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects to debate; he cannot object to one member speaking and not to another.

Mr. COX. Perhaps he likes me better than he does the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a question cognizable under the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. The rules do not allow one man to be liked any better than anybody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. The sensitiveness of the gentleman from Wisconsin prevents me from yielding further.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not object to the gentleman from Massachusetts yielding the floor; he has nothing to yield.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make one remark. It is very important for the business of the committees to maintain the morning hour, which affords the only opportunity that most committees have to make their reports. The Chair would therefore suggest that the Committee on Ways and Means ought not to report in the morning hour that which they can as well report at any other time. The Committee on Ways and Means, it is true, is upon the regular call in the morning hour; but it is called for business not privileged. The reports which the gentleman from Massachusetts has presented this morning are, under the rules, privileged to be made at any time. The Chair throws out this hint, that the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Ways and Means, and the Committee on Elections ought not to occupy the morning hour with discussions and reports which can come up as well at any time.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Ways and Means were entirely aware of that rule; but owing to the importance of this matter I was instructed by the committee to take the first moment when I could obtain the floor to present the subject to the House. I therefore availed myself of my right under the regular call of committees, fully conscious of the fact that we could report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe, however, that this report has operated to interfere with the privilege of other committees, which have not the right to report at any other time than upon the regular call. The gentleman knows that the Committee on Ways and Means never have any difficulty in getting the floor; and hence they ought not to take it to the exclusion of other committees that have not the same privilege.

Mr. DAWES. After this question is disposed of I will yield to a member of my committee who has business which is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that this bill be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order for Thursday next at three o'clock, and from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with appropriation bills already reported or hereafter to be reported.

Mr. COX. I move to amend that motion in one regard, so as to provide for printing an extra number of copies.

The SPEAKER. That motion would have to go to the Committee on Printing under the law.

Mr. COX. Then I will withdraw the motion for the purpose of explaining it. [Laughter.] Gentlemen who represent here commercial centers would like to have something a little more definite than this bill. It settles nothing as to our future policy. The business of the country depends upon action here upon this subject. The mere setting down of this bill for next Wednesday or Thursday fixes nothing. The bill, if properly interpreted, as business men will interpret it, is a recognition of the issue of this reserve. That is what it means. It is a step away from resumption. In spite of all that is said here, the people so regard it; and it ought to be so understood.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to this debate if it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes the gentleman from New York is making a personal explanation.

Mr. COX. Sir, we are relapsing into barbarism——

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that personal? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is objected to. The Chair hears no objection to making the order proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. That order will be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President, by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, announcing that he had approved and signed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

An act (H. R. No. 793) repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress and other officers;

An act (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish; and

An act (H. R. No. 718) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed a concurrent resolution that it shall not be lawful for the Congressional Printer to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any speech, or part of a speech, not actually delivered in the Senate or in the House of Representatives; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It further announced that that body had passed an act (S. No. 360) making appropriations for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 1218) to provide for the purchase of fire-extinguishers for the Capitol building.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that these appropriation bills be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask to have one of the bills, on plans and surveys for the Capitol grounds, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I object to the consideration of the question at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my motion.

SAVINGS-BANKS.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to the gentleman yielding until he has something to yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill (H. R. No. 1399) amending the ninth section of an act approved July 13, 1866, concerning deposits in savings-banks.

The bill was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read at length, provides that the proviso to section 110 of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, as amended by the act approved July 13, 1866, shall hereafter be held and construed to include, within the exemptions therein made as to deposits in savings-banks, all deposits in savings-banks doing business only as such under the laws of their respective States, or of Congress, and having a paid-up capital which is first responsible for all losses of depositors, or having, in accordance with law, in place of such capital stock a good and legal guarantee bond securing depositors against loss; provided that no savings-bank or provident institution shall be entitled to such exemption from tax on deposits as aforesaid in case any greater rate of dividend shall be paid to the holders of capital stock annually, than the rate of interest allowed annually to time depositors in such bank; but 2¼ per cent. may be allowed and paid upon the amount of the capital stock, or of the guarantee bond, in consideration of such guarantee against loss to depositors; and provided further that all profits of such savings-banks, less the aforesaid dividend and allowance for guarantee, shall be divided among their depositors. The second section provides that no tax accrued or claimed for years prior to the passage of this act from savings-banks, in the first section named, having a capital stock or guarantee bond, but not collected nor claimed by the revenue officers in those years, shall be hereafter collected.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise to a point of order. That bill relates to the tax system of the country, and should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have that bill printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that this, relating to taxation, must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair sustains the point of order; and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and is ordered to be printed.

Mr. KASSON. I wished also to ask the House if a simple explanation would obviate the necessity for the bill going to the Committee of the Whole. I would make it, but if no one desires an explanation I will not make it now.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say this——

Mr. KELLEY. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. BECK. I only wish to say that I do not think an explanation will obviate the necessity of the bill going to the Committee of the Whole, because there are several members of the Ways and Means Committee who will oppose the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will observe more and more the necessity for a strict observance of the rules of the House in referring at once subjects which must have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole, and thereby save the time of the House.

Mr. KASSON. Let it be printed and go to the Committee of the Whole, and make it a special order for one day later than the other bills.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object to that, if an objection will avail.

The SPEAKER. An objection will avail. It will go to the Committee of the Whole without being made a special order.

The Chair has made this morning a somewhat new ruling in this respect, which he thinks, however, to be entirely correct, that a tax bill reported adversely upon should go immediately to the Committee of the Whole. It has been the practice of the House hitherto to allow the question to be taken first as to whether they would agree with the adverse report or not, and if they agreed, then the report went upon the table—it was not before the House for action, and therefore was not amenable to the rules. The Chair has concluded it is within the scope of larger and freer discussion; that even when tax bills are reported adversely, they should go to the Committee of the Whole, where there is no restriction whatever on discussion, and therefore he sustains the point of order, and rules that even on an adverse report the question shall not first be taken in the House. It is in the interest of wider and freer discussion.

Mr. KASSON. Before this is disposed of I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] to one circumstance which I think should induce him to withdraw his objection to making this a special order. Owing to a late construction of the tax law, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has ordered in certain cases the collection of taxes for several years past, which were not supposed by anybody at that time to have been due or collectible; and consequently it is very desirable to have the action of the House upon that. I ask that this be assigned to the same day, in order that it may be taken up when the first bill is disposed of. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will give us an opportunity of having the bill taken up on the day named, and it will be in the power of the committee to lay it aside if it takes up too much time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would be glad to see that I was mistaken in the view I take of the bill. I cannot tell, from reading it cursorily, the whole effect of it; but a similar subject has been before the Committee on Banking and Currency, and has been considered there.

Mr. KELLEY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, this was not made a special order.

The SPEAKER. It was not; and the Chair begs to state that negotiations by unanimous consent must not delay the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the objection I have made.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

BONDED WAREHOUSES FOR RICE.

Mr. SHELDON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 476) to establish bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation.

The bill provides that from and after the passage of the act importers' bonded warehouses, to be established for the storage and cleansing of imported rice for exportation to foreign countries, may be established at any port of entry in the United States, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. SHELDON. Before the holidays I offered that bill and asked unanimous consent for its passage. Objection was made, which has since been withdrawn; and I ask for the passage of the bill now, believing it to be unnecessary to debate it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Louisiana propose to put this bill on its passage now?

Mr. SHELDON. I do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to draw the attention of the House to two or three things I am afraid about? I would object to the bill being put on its passage now; but I suppose the gentleman has the right to ask it, this being the morning hour, and the committee being on call.

I am opposed to the bonded-warehouse system altogether, which allows foreigners to bring their goods here and store them without paying duty until they can find a good time to place them on the market. But, perhaps, this bill does not afford a proper occasion for the discussion of that question. This bill, however, makes an innovation upon the whole bonded system of the country. The bonded-warehouse system of the country provides that when goods are brought in, bulk shall not be broken or in any way changed except for the purpose of preservation; as, for instance, if they are moldy, or a package of liquor should spring a leak, then goods may be changed, but the character of the goods shall not be changed while in the bonded warehouse.

This bill permits rice to be brought in in bulk uncleaned, and then manufactured here, the manufacture consisting first in cleaning and then polishing it, so as to make it equal in look to the best rice. My difficulty with the bill is that I am afraid it will open an immense avenue to frauds in importations. Rice is only extensively used by the inhabitants of tropical and semi-tropical regions. The bill would allow rice to be brought into this country, to be cleaned in our bonded warehouses, and then exported abroad without payment of duty, and without any advantage to us except the advantage of having it cleaned and manufactured upon our soil. It would have the effect of bringing it in in this way to Louisiana, for instance, and perhaps Florida and Georgia, and perhaps California, though with reference to California it would not be open so much to the objection I have, and of allowing it to be sent forward, after it had been cleaned, to the West India Islands. And the difficulty would be, as it seems to me, that great frauds without a possibility of detection can be perpetrated, besides allowing the Government bonded warehouses to come into direct competition with the rice-producing fields of South Carolina and Georgia. I call the attention of the gentlemen from those States who have that great interest in charge to this question, whether they propose virtually to repeal the duty on rice; because it will turn out that a great deal would be re-exported, and a great deal would slip into consumption. That was the reason why there never was any allowance made in our old bonded-warehouse system for breaking bulk. I should like, therefore, to hear from my friend from Louisiana the reason why he considers this bill desirable.

Mr. SHELDON. I anticipated that objection, and it was fully considered in the committee. The Secretary of the Treasury was consulted upon that point, and when the bill was formerly before the House I had his letter read. I now send it to the Clerk's desk to be again read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as the original document is not now in my hand.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Should not this bill go to the Committee of the Whole? It may be too late to make the point now.

The SPEAKER. The bill would undoubtedly have gone to the Committee of the Whole if the point of order had been made upon it in time, for it belongs to the Committee of the Whole. It is now too late to raise the point, the bill having been debated at some length in the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I raised the point of order in what I said a few minutes ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proceeded to discuss this bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I intended myself to raise the point of order; but my colleague raised it and then proceeded to make an explanation, as is frequently done, and the Chair allowed him to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The ear of the Chair was very wide open to hear whether the point of order was raised, because it was a wonder to him that somebody did not raise it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] did not raise the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The exact words I used, I believe, were these, "I suppose that this may be put on its passage now, or otherwise I should object."

The SPEAKER. Even then the gentleman allowed the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SHELDON] to discuss the bill. The bill ought to have gone to the Committee of the Whole; but it is now too late to raise the point.

Mr. SHELDON. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1873.

SIR: Referring to the conversation had with you this morning in regard to the bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. POTTER, of New York, to permit the establishment of warehouses for the cleaning of imported rice in bond for export, I have to say that this Department apprehends no difficulty in preparing such regulations (should such bill become a law) as will entirely prevent frauds upon the revenue in that respect, and at the same time give exporters all the facilities they may be entitled to thereunder.

I am, very respectfully,

W. A. RICHARDSON, Secretary.

Hon. L. A. SHELDON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SHELDON. I wish to say that the Committee on Ways and Means had considered the question whether frauds upon the revenue could be perpetrated under this bill. The case was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose letter has just been read, and he says that he thinks frauds could be prevented. The committee were unanimous in authorizing this bill to be reported. It does not affect the question of revenue at all. It is simply a question whether we will allow people bringing cargoes of rice from foreign countries into this country to clean that rice and prepare it for re-exportation. I understand that it reduces the bulk of the rice but little to clean it, and it has become quite a considerable trade. It seems to the committee, as it seemed to me, that it is proper and right that we should give to our citizens the advantage of doing just exactly this thing, as it will facilitate commerce, and besides will encourage some industries in this country, especially in cities where it is now so much needed.

So far as the rice-producing regions of our country are concerned, I will say that we have no interest in this matter at all, none in the world. Of course Louisiana rice is exported; but there is not so much rice produced in the Union as is consumed by the people of the United States. It is simply a question whether we shall grant this privilege to those who desire to bring from the East Indies cargoes of this kind of rice and afford them facilities for exporting it again. I will ask that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] who introduced this bill may be heard upon it.

Mr. POTTER. I do not claim to know everything about the policy of bonded warehouses, and when this measure was called to my attention, which was by a gentleman in New York, engaged in the manufacture of sugar, of very high standing, I declined to introduce the bill until I had consulted the Treasury Department about it. I did so, and understood from the chief of customs that this measure was entirely free from the objections the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had indicated. At a later day I sent a letter, to like effect, which I received from that officer, to a gentleman on the other side of the House from South Carolina, but for some reason I fail to have it now at hand and cannot have it read.

This bill does not affect the consumers of rice in this country at all. There are two sorts of rice consumed in this country, one produced in the Southern States and one produced in the East Indies. East India rice comes into this country in a dirty state, and must be cleaned and polished before fit for consumption. That rice, to a certain extent, does go into consumption here, but only after it has paid the duty upon it. When imported and taken out of bond for consumption, it must necessarily pay whatever duty may be levied upon it. But this bill does not affect that rice at all. The citizen who consumes rice in this country that comes from the East Indies is in no way affected whether it pays duty before or after it is cleaned, and therefore this bill cannot affect consumers here.

But there is a large amount of East India rice consumed in the West Indies and South America, as I understand, that is now largely supplied by Great Britain. It is imported in its unclean state from the East Indies into Great Britain, and cleaned by machines in operation there, and is then transported to the West Indies and South America, where it finds a market. Now, our people have facilities for cleaning this East India rice, and it is therefore a matter of importance for them to have opportunity to bring this rice in return cargoes from the East Indies, and clean it with the machines which we have in this country, not only for consumption here, but also for reexport again, if that can be done without their being obliged to pay duty on it.

The only question that could arise as to this measure would seem to be whether, under the system of such bonded warehouses as it proposes, the Government would be liable to the frauds suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] That question was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and his answer you have heard from the letter read, that there would be no difficulty whatever in that respect. It is simply, then, a question whether the cleaning of this East India rice, to be consumed in the West Indies, shall be done in England altogether or whether it may be done in part in this country; whether vessels coming from the East Indies may bring to the port of New York, or such other of our ports as they may return to, this foreign rice and have it cleaned here by machines already in existence and again shipped for consumption abroad, or the business shall be confined to England as now.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] if this is not a measure in the interest of the rice-millers of New York, and if it is not to the prejudice of the rice-cleaning mills in the cities on the southern coast.

Mr. POTTER. I cannot conceive this bill to be in the interest of anybody except rice-cleaning millers—men who are engaged in the manufacture and cleaning of rice; but that it should benefit those millers at New York is no reason why it should injure those in the South.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the Government has already adopted the principle of establishing warehouses for the purpose of having certain articles produced or manufactured in this country exported; and that such a system is in the interest of the laboring population.

Mr. POTTER. I understand that the discrimination in this respect is for the benefit of the manufacturers in this country, and that the principle has been already adopted, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I believe that there is nothing which is permitted to be changed in bulk while in bond. My attention was called to this matter in connection with fish which were allowed to be introduced into the country in bulk and under a Treasury regulation were packed for exportation—a regulation which largely interfered with the interests of my constituents. I had supposed the case might be similar with respect to rice. As to fish, I procured the withdrawal of the Treasury regulation as contrary to law. I have done my duty in bringing this matter to the attention of the House. If those who are in the rice interest and have this matter in charge have no objection to the bill, I have not.

Mr. SHELDON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHELDON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEST VIRGINIA ELECTION CASES.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolutions, reported from the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, (first,) That Mr. Davis, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, (second,) That Mr. Hagans, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, (third,) That Mr. Wilson, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was elected upon the day lawfully prescribed for the election of Representatives in Congress in the State of West Virginia, and is hereby admitted to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON,] whose remarks were interrupted yesterday by the taking of a recess, is entitled to the floor for the remainder of his hour.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Elections, to whom this subject has been referred, I have endeavored to give it the attention which its importance demands. The question presented for our consideration is, which of the two congressional elections held in West Virginia in 1872 is the valid one? I think it will conduce to simplicity of view to consider each of these elections separately, and in the order of their occurrence.

On the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, an election was held in West Virginia to determine the adoption or rejection of the new constitution of the State, and to elect the officers created by it, in the event of its adoption. At that election, in forty counties out of fifty-four, votes were cast for Congressmen. It is a noteworthy fact, though I do not think it material to the legal questions, that the aggregate congressional vote amounted to only 44,000, while 81,000 votes were cast upon the constitution. In other words, 37,000 voters in actual attendance at the polls refused to participate in this congressional election.

There is another fact worthy of attention in this matter. In the second district only 3,000 votes and a small fraction over were cast for members of Congress out of 26,000 that were cast upon the constitution, and the bulk of those 3,000 votes was cast in three or four counties—eleven counties of the eighteen not casting a single vote for Congressmen. My colleague on the committee, from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON,] is mistaken in saying there is no evidence of such fact. The certified returns before the committee show it.

Upon this brief statement of facts the important question arises, were the electors (called together on that day for the purpose of determining upon the adoption of the constitution and for electing officers under it) authorized to elect members of Congress for the State of West Virginia? Mr. Speaker, the election of Representatives of a State, in the Congress of the United States, is a high and solemn act of sovereignty, exercised in the name of that State. If therefore the electors had not the right to cast their suffrages for Representatives in Congress, then the action of those 44,000 voters in the forty counties was an unlawful and irregular proceeding, not perhaps criminal morally if entered into under a misapprehension, but none the less a lawless usurpation of political power, which can give no title to the men, so chosen, to be admitted here as members of the House of Representatives.

The question recurs, had these electors the legal authority to exercise, on that day, this high and solemn function? The majority of the committee—a majority amounting almost to unanimity—have decided and reported to this House that no such authority existed. A majority of nine out of eleven declared that the election was invalid and void. Whatever diversities of opinion there may be in that committee upon the other branch of this subject, upon this there is a concurrence, both as to the conclusion and reasoning, that that election was without the authority of law.

Whence did they derive their authority? What provision of law, statute or fundamental, conferred upon these electors the right of arrogating to themselves this high and sovereign prerogative? There can be but one answer to this question, and that is, that if the authority existed at all, it was conferred upon them by the schedule which was appended to the constitution, submitting that instrument for adoption or rejection to the people, and ordering an election of the officers created by it.

That is the only authority; for outside of that schedule there is no authority in any law, organic or otherwise, for the election of any officers of any kind, State or Federal, in August. Hence, in the debate which took place on this subject before, the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who is never deficient in clearness and force of statement, took the position that it was the schedule which gave the authority; and the report of the sub-committee—that submitted by the member from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON]—derived the authority from the same instrument. The member from Massachusetts, on the occasion of that debate, speaking of the schedule submitting the constitution to the people, said:

> It also provided that there should be a general election held on that day, including members of Congress.

Now, sir, I propose to analyze this schedule, for the purpose of seeing whether there is any warrant for the statement, that in the schedule members of Congress were included among the officers ordered to be elected on the day therein named.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is asking much of the House to listen to a dry, prolix, legal argument; but, sir, it is our duty, made so by the Constitution, as judges of elections, to give our best attention to such subjects.

The schedule, after providing for the submission of the constitution and for the election, goes on to say:

> On the same day, and under the superintendence of the officers who shall conduct the election for determining the ratification or rejection of the constitution and schedule, elections shall be held at the several places of voting in each county—for senators and members of the house of delegates, and all officers, executive, judicial, county, or district, required by this constitution to be elected by the people.

Now, sir, where is the authority for this statement that the schedule "included members of Congress" among the officers to be elected? The schedule is more than ordinarily specific in its enumeration, by name and class, in detail, of the officers required to be elected, and, as if with studied intent, members of Congress are left out. Let me not be misunderstood. I am not invoking the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius est. I am not seeking to show that the election of Congressmen was excluded or forbidden. The thing we are seeking for in that instrument is not negative prohibition, but affirmative authority.

Let it be admitted that this maxim does not apply to the construction of organic law. In order to bring the question to a narrower compass I will admit that omission to name Congressmen, in the specification of officers to be elected, would not, necessarily, be an exclusion of the election of the former, provided you can find me any other provision or clause in the schedule or expression which, by general intendment, would show that members of Congress were within the contemplation of the framers of that instrument. But there is no such provision; there is no such clause; not a word out of which you can wring or extort or distort such a construction.

[Messages from the President and the Senate were received here, which will be found in another place.]

Mr. LAMAR. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, there was nothing in the text of this schedule to authorize the election of Congressmen, as claimed by the gentlemen who maintain the right of the August claimants; on the contrary, the manifest intent of the framers of that schedule to exclude members of Congress from that election can be illustrated in so many ways that I am embarrassed by abundance. Look at the aim and the object of the schedule; look at the purpose for which it was adopted; look at the office which the schedule is intended to perform. Mr. Speaker, a schedule is never a part of the permanent law of any State, either fundamental or statute. It is simply an addendum to the constitution, temporary in its nature, and for a temporary purpose. Its object is to test the will of the people upon the election; to secure the transit of the State from the old organization to the new one without any lapse of existing rights; and to put in operation the newly created agencies and institutions. That was the object of this schedule. To effect it, it was necessary to have an election for the newly created offices; an election conditioned to be void if the constitution was not adopted. Such being the object of the schedule, and the words of it and the context of it being specially limited to that object, strained must be the construction which seeks to extend it to other and entirely different objects.

Now, sir, is it not manifest that in this programme, this provisional programme of conditional elections (all to be rendered nugatory and invalid in case of non-adoption) the congressional election had no appropriate place? To have put it there would have been to introduce an incongruity. Mr. Speaker, a congressional election, from its very nature, ought not, and in my opinion it cannot be, constitutionally, subjected to the annulling conditions of a provisional local election. I say, sir, from the very place that these congressional elections hold in our political system, they must necessarily, when they are conducted fairly and legally, be absolute, final, and unconditioned by any contingencies which look to their nullification. Why, sir, these elections are the only connection between the power of the people of a State and the Federal Government. Their recurrence regularly and with absolute certainty is indispensable to the organization of Congress and to the perpetuation of its power. In each State they constitute the only arteries through which the State pours fresh currents of popular power and life into the Federal organism.

Sir, to place such elections as these in a schedule, and make them nugatory upon certain changes of a purely local character, I repeat, would produce a derangement of political conditions.

But, sir, there is another reason, and a strong one, which conspired to cause that convention to exclude from the schedule any provision for the election of members of Congress. It is a fact, very well known to all the members of this House, that it has been the policy of this Government of late years to supervise the elections in the Southern States by agencies of its own appointment. It is also well known that this supervision and intervention have been a source of harassment and distrust to a large portion of the people of those States, keeping them away by thousands from the polls. It is another fact, sir, well known, that that portion to which this supervision was unacceptable had a majority of delegates in the convention that framed this schedule. And here, sir, you have another reason why, in providing an election affecting their own local domiciliary and domestic arrangements they excluded any provision for the election of Federal officers. They did it, sir, because they wished to conduct their elections free from the supervision of the national constabulary. They wanted to establish their domestic institutions free from the presence of that mighty power whose iron hand, so often uplifted, had crushed the fragile tenements of State authority.

Now, sir, in order to get the authority for the election of Congressmen in August from that schedule, you must do it by construing into it words that are not there; you must, by construction, interpolate a positive provision it does not contain—a provision inconsistent with its context, repugnant to its manifest object and intent, and at war with its reason and spirit. I do not say such a construction is impossible; but I submit that it should be supported by clear and overwhelming reasons.

Let us now see what force, if there be any, is in the construction proposed by the member from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON.] It is that while the schedule does not, in terms, order, or attempt to order, members of Congress to be elected on the fourth Thursday of August, yet by ordering "a general election" of State officers to be held on that day, it in effect occasions the election of Congressmen to be held on the same day, through the operation of the code. In other words, that the code without fixing any particular time for the congressional elections, provides that it shall be held at the general election of State officers, whenever that may be; that the schedule provides that the general election shall be held on the fourth Thursday of August. Therefore the schedule, by force of the code, provides that the congressional election shall take place on the fourth Thursday of August. Is this not a correct statement of the argument of my colleague on the committee, and of those who agree with him? If it is not, I ask that he will correct me. Whatever defects my argument may have, I do not wish misstatements of the positions of those from whom I differ to be among them.

This makes it necessary to examine that provision of the code which forces into the schedule an enactment so inharmonious with its existing provisions, and so foreign to the purposes for which it was adopted. What does it say?

SECTION 1. The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers and members of the Legislature shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

SEC. 2. At the said elections, in every year, there shall be elected delegates to the Legislature, and one senator for every senatorial district. And in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, * * * a Representative in the Congress of the United States, for the term beginning on the 4th day of March next after the election, for every congressional district

It matters not which of the opposing constructions of the phrase, "said elections," you adopt; whether it refers to the words "general elections," as these gentlemen contend, or whether it refers to the time prescribed in the first section, one thing is undenied and undeniable, that is, the code fixes the day of the congressional election on the fourth Thursday of October. Whether fixed relatively or derivatively through the general election, or absolutely and irrespectively of that event, the time of the congressional election is prescribed on the fourth Thursday of October. You may construe, and twist, and turn the provision as you may—there are the words, "fourth Thursday of October," expressly prescribed, on your own construction. You cannot look at the words "general elections" without seeing the words "on the fourth Thursday of October." You are constrained, even on your own construction, to admit that the code in terms prescribed the fourth Thursday in October for the congressional election; and you are constrained to admit that the schedule did not, in terms, prescribe the fourth Thursday in August for these elections. In other words, to make out the case for the August claimants, you have to construe words and provisions into the schedule which it confessedly does not contain, and to construe out of the code the express words and provisions which it does contain.

I ask the House to note the striking contrast between the respective positions of those who oppose and those who maintain the validity of the August election. Those who deny it put themselves upon the plain, common-sense meaning of the code and of the schedule. Those who maintain it are forced to resort to subtlety and refinement; construing out of the code what it expressly provides, and into the schedule what it manifestly never intended to provide. I repeat, that I do not say anything is beyond the resources of construction. But if this work of implication upon implication is sustained, it should be labeled "Construction construed."

But let us reduce to analysis the process by which this result is reached. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that the words "at the said elections," with which the second section begins, means "at the general election of State officers," whenever that may be held, without any reference to time; and that when that general election was changed by competent authority, the congressional election followed it, as the mere incident follows the principal. Sir, the construction put upon those words, "at the said elections," has not the shadow of reason to sustain it. I know the strength of my assertion, and have not made it without due reflection.

In the first place, the phraseology of the section, even isolated from the other provisions, does not sanction it.

If the compilers of the code had intended that the congressional election should hinge on the general State elections, whenever the latter might occur, they would have used words expressive of that intent. If it had been intended simply to designate the one as the occasion of the other, irrespective of the day expressly designated, instead of commencing the second section with the words "at the said elections," they would have used the words "at the general election" or "whenever the general election may be held," or some other equivalent phrase that would have excluded the element of time from that section.

In this assertion I am sustained by the language of the code itself in the succeeding section, wherein the election of certain officers is directed to be held "at the general election."

In every instance in which the code provides for an election to be held "at the general election" it uses the words "at the general election."

The first three sections of this chapter of the code prescribe the elections which shall be held at a given time. The first is the general State election; the second section prescribes some others with that of members of Congress, and the time is the fourth Thursday in October, fixed there either in immediate connection with the officers named or by words of reference relating to the time as the last antecedent. The third section prescribes the Federal electoral election, with the time mentioned—i. e., Tuesday next after the first Monday in November. But when you come to the fourth section you find a group of officers whose elections are intended to take place simultaneously, in conjunction with the general election, irrespective of time. Now let me quote the exact language employed. I hope I will have the attention of the gentlemen who have put so much stress upon these words, "at the said elections," whilst I make these quotations. Section 4 of the code provides—

At the general election in every year the voters of every township shall elect a supervisor, clerk of the township, a surveyor of roads, overseer of the poor, and township treasurer.

Now, why did not the code use the words "at the said election?" It was because the said election does not mean at the general election.

But this is not all of it; there are other officers to be elected on the same occasion. How is that occasion indicated? By the words "at the said elections?" Not at all. Let us quote:

At the general election in the years, &c., the voters of every township shall elect a justice; and an additional justice if the white population exceed twelve hundred.

And here is still another:

And at the general election in the year, &c., they shall elect as many constables as justices and a county superintendent.

Now, why does not the second section use the same language in reference to the congressional election? It is because it was not intended to convey the same idea; it is because the code intended to prescribe the time of holding that election, as it was required to do by the mandate of the Constitution of the United States. But there was no such imperative obligation as to these other elections. Hence it uses these words, making the distinction between the general election as an occasion and the "said election"—referring to the fourth Thursday in October.

Now, there is no escaping from this distinction made by the code itself. How are you going to escape from it? The member from Wisconsin, with great confidence, gives you the clew. He says that the word employed to introduce the said second section rendered it very manifest that reference was had to the general election, without any reference to time.

He tells you that there is a wonderful significance attaching to the word "at" in this sentence; and I must confess I held my breath in silent wonder at the potency he claimed for it. The gentleman threw all his emphasis upon it, "at the said elections." I listened to his argument attentively; the word does not advance us one step in the solution of the question. Take the meaning he attaches to it, and read the sentence as if it were "in conjunction with the said election," the question still remains what "said election?"—the election fixed for October, or any general election, as he contends?—and you cannot say it means the latter without assuming the very point in dispute. Strange as it may seem, the gentleman in his own report gave an instance in which the word "at" is used in the very sense that he denies it is ever used; I mean to denote time—day and month. On page 20 he gives an extract from the California constitution, which is as follows: "At the general election, namely, the 13th day of November," &c.

So, sir, the word "at" may refer to the day, if it is in a California statute, but in a West Virginia statute it swings the occasion of an election against the very words of a code, into a schedule, against the very intent and meaning of that schedule.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I beg to submit a point to the gentleman, not by way of controverting his position, but to elicit his view of a question that has occurred to me. I understand him to argue that the provision of the code establishing the fourth Thursday of October as the day of the general election for members of Congress was still in existence, and was the law of West Virginia at the time of the election in 1872.

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Now I ask the gentleman whether he gives any effect to that clause of the constitution—not the schedule, but the constitution—which is recited on the first page of the majority report, article 4, section 7, of the constitution?

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman's question is perfectly pertinent as applied to that branch of the argument; but I am now discussing the August election. When I come to the October election, if I do not give due notice and attention to the point the gentleman makes, I admit my argument will be defective.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I did not desire to interrupt the gentleman's argument.

Mr. LAMAR. I am perfectly willing to yield for interruption, and think the question not an improper one.

Now suppose this code of which we are speaking is capable of two constructions—either the construction that it refers to the time mentioned, (the fourth Thursday of October,) or the construction the gentleman puts upon it, that it refers to the general election; here is a proposition that I believe any one will concede.

Suppose the words of the code would bear either construction, it cannot be doubted that the one which makes the text of the law consistent with the constitutional requirement should be accepted in preference to any construction that renders it violative of that requirement.

The Constitution declares that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives to Congress shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof. This is the command of the Constitution to the Legislature. It is absolute. Now, what the Constitution enjoins absolutely the Constitution means to be enforced absolutely. Not to enforce it absolutely is to violate the Constitution. To connect with its enforcement a contingency upon the happening of which it may not be enforced is equally a violation. Now, sir, according to our construction the Legislature did, in exact obedience to the Constitution, prescribe the time for electing the Congressmen on the fourth Thursday in October.

But according to the August claimants Congress did not absolutely prescribe the time, but prescribed the occasion, leaving it to be fixed or not fixed, in the discretion of another distinct department or body to whom the constitutional mandate was not addressed. Sir, such a construction makes the action of the Legislature only a conditional obedience to the Constitution which the convention might, at any time, without intending it, convert into a disobedience.

Is it not, then, clear that the Legislature would be transferring to another distinct body a duty which the constitution had devolved upon itself?

I submit, therefore, that even if this clause is equally susceptible (which I deny) of either, ours is to be preferred, because it is in exact obedience to the Constitution, while the other is an evasion, if not a direct contravention, of its mandates.

The effort of the gentleman to show that this was not the case, by referring to the Virginia precedents, will not do. He is mistaken in his point. There are no such precedents. I challenge the production of a single precedent in the Virginia statutes connecting the congressional election with an event whose date was not already fixed and defined by the Legislature itself. I want the gentleman to show a single precedent where the Legislature of Virginia ever made the congressional election to hang upon an event prescribed by any power save that of the Legislature itself. It never did so. On the other hand, West Virginia has always, by its own Legislature, fixed the policy of prescribing the day itself when the congressional election shall take place, as was shown yesterday in the able and profound argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH.]

But, sir, I take higher ground. I take the position, even if this section could bear the construction these gentlemen would put on it, so much of it as makes the Legislature give to the convention the power of changing the time for holding a congressional election is unconstitutional, and that it leaves valid only that much of the statute which prescribes the fourth Thursday of October as the day.

Sir, this power is given to the Legislature. The duty is devolved upon it—"the time shall be prescribed by the Legislature." Legislative power cannot be delegated. The power and the duty which the constitution devolves upon the Legislature cannot be surrendered.* It cannot be transferred to another body to which the constitution does not address itself, and which therefore is under no special obligation to carry that provision out. They attempt to avoid that position, for it is one which cannot be met, by saying this legislation thus construed would not involve delegation of power, but is merely conditional legislation like that which is sometimes exercised by Congress and sometimes by States to make statutes to go into operation on a certain condition, or those which provide that upon the happening of a certain condition their operation is to be suspended. That does not meet the point. In my opinion, it is no conditional legislation in that view; but, even if it were so, those cases are not like this one would be. Those cases are where the Legislature and Congress have discretionary power to legislate or not legislate as they may see proper. For instance, in the case cited by the attorney of the August claimant, where Congress passed a law to stop commerce between Great Britain and the United States, and provided that the law was not to continue in effect after Great Britain revoked certain orders, the court, decided that the statute did not delegate power to Great Britain to stop a law operating in this country. So, too, there have been State laws which were not to go into operation except upon the result of certain local elections. In that case Congress had discretion either to interdict commerce or not to interdict it, and therefore could prescribe a condition upon which the interdict should not go into effect. So, too, in the other cases the Legislature had the discretion to pass the law or not to pass it, and therefore had the power to provide for the suspension of it upon a contingency to be determined by a local election. But here, sir, there is no discretion. The mandate of the Constitution is peremptory. There is no discretionary power to abstain from prescribing the time. "The time shall be prescribed;" and not to prescribe it, or to prescribe it on a condition which may defeat it, is to violate the constitution.

Even admitting all I have said is not true, that August election was, in no sense of the term, "a general election." It was a provisional election held for a special purpose. It did not belong to the class and the group of annually recurring general elections which take place in the current life of the State, but was abnormal in its character, and was special in its object, and special in having its validity subject to be set aside. No, sir. The schedule itself expressly characterizes this election, and shows it not to be a general election. Here is the schedule on the first page of the report: "The officers authorized by existing laws to conduct general elections"—shall do what? Hold a general election? No—"shall cause elections to be held"—showing a distinction between this election here prescribed and "the general election" under the existing law—"at the several places for voting, established by law, in each county, on the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, at which"—general election? Not a bit of it—"at which elections the votes of all persons qualified to vote under the existing constitution, and offering to vote, shall be taken upon the question of ratifying or rejecting the constitution and schedule."

Now in the next sentence: "On the same day and under the superintendence of the officers who shall conduct the elections for determining the ratification or rejection of the constitution and schedule, elections shall be held at the several places of voting," &c. "Such elections shall be by ballot."

The schedule repeatedly designates it as an "election" distinct in character and purpose from the "general election" provided for by "existing laws."

Mr. GARFIELD. While not desiring to interrupt the gentleman, I ask him a question suggested by the clause he has quoted.

The constitution provides—

> On the same day, and under the superintendence of the officers who shall conduct the election for determining the ratification or rejection of the constitution and schedule, elections shall be held at the several places of voting in each county, for senators and members of the house of delegates, and all officers, executive, judicial, county, or district, required by this constitution to be elected by the people.

I desire to ask the gentleman whether the last clause, in his judgment, does or does not include members of Congress?

Mr. LAMAR. By no means. I will ask the gentleman if members of Congress are required by that constitution of West Virginia to be elected by the people.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know, as I have not read the whole of that constitution.

Mr. LAMAR. I know that the Constitution of the United States requires it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know that; but I did not know but the constitution of West Virginia might also make that provision.

Mr. LAMAR. It is not so. There is not a syllable in the constitution of the State requiring Congressmen to be elected by the people.

Mr. GARFIELD. I merely asked the question for information.

Mr. LAMAR. I understand that; and I am very much obliged to the gentleman for eliciting the fact.

Mr. GOOCH. I desire to ask the gentleman another question with reference to that last clause. Does it not make that election a general election?

Mr. LAMAR. By no means. The mere election of officers generally does not necessarily constitute a general election.

Mr. GOOCH. That is not the point. It is the election of all the officers provided for by the constitution of the State. Now, does not that prescribe just the same kind of election that the first section of the code provides for when it uses the language "the general election?"

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir; there is a large number of officers who are elected by the provisions of law, and not by the constitution. But even if the gentleman's construction was correct, the election of all the officers at one election would not constitute a general election; would it? Does the gentleman think so? Suppose it were to be a provisional election, so that all the officers should hold their offices for two months until the next general election, prescribed in the new constitution, would that have been a general election?

Mr. GOOCH. Perhaps the gentleman will allow me to ask him another question. Was there any general election in that State that year?

Mr. LAMAR. There was not. There was no general election in that State in that year; nor is there a general election in my State every year. There are many years, sir, in which there is no general election. And the fact that all the officers are elected does not make an election which casually springs up in a particular year, purely provisional and special, never having occurred before, and never to recur again in the history of the State, a general election.

Mr. GOOCH. I wish to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. LAMAR. My time is running away very fast, and I do not wish to be detained long on this point. While the election of officers generally is indispensable to a general election, yet that one feature does not constitute a general election. There must be other elements to make it a general election.

Mr. GOOCH. I desire to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RANDALL in the chair.) Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] consent to be interrupted?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir; but I am not willing that it should come out of my time. I have not yet fully presented my argument.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It must necessarily come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. LAMAR. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts must excuse me.

Mr. GOOCH. Only a moment. Did not the old law provide for a general election in the State of West Virginia; and did not, also, the constitution provide for a general election in the State of West Virginia?

Mr. LAMAR. It provides for an election.

Mr. GOOCH. A general election?

Mr. LAMAR. A general election of some officers; and of some officers for two years, and of some officers for four years.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. And of some the constitution does not speak at all.

Mr. LAMAR. Yes; of a great many of them the constitution does not speak at all.

I do not, however, wish to linger here any further than to say that this August election, held for the special purpose of setting up the new constitution, on a special day, never occurring before or since, and valid only on a special contingency (to wit, the adoption of this constitution) cannot be called "the general election" described in the first section of the third chapter of the code.

As to the October election.

It is true, there is on this branch of the subject some diversity of opinion between the chairman's course of reasoning and that adopted in the report submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.] But, sir, we do not, as I understand it, differ from the reasoning of the chairman. I wish it distinctly understood that there is not a position in his report which I do not unconditionally indorse. The report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] was prepared before the chairman's report was read to us, and as he came to his conclusion by a different process from that which conducted us to the same conclusion we put both reports before the House. But, sir, there is no conflict of reasoning, nor inconsistency in the positions assumed in the two reports.

There is, sir, but one ground upon which the validity of this October election is disputed; and that is that the words in the code, "the said election," referred to the general election. I have shown that assumption to be erroneous. The words of the section seem to me too plain for controversy:

> The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

Now read the next section in the light of the constitutional requirement that the Legislature shall prescribe the time of holding the congressional election:

> At the said elections * * * there shall be elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States * * * * for every congressional district.

Here are time and occasion blended all in one sentence. How can it be assumed that the Legislature referred not to the time, but to the occasion? That time for the congressional election is the fourth Thursday of October. Has it been changed as to the congressional election? Not by any subsequent Legislature. Not by the schedule, as I have shown. Has that day been changed by the new constitution, in that clause referred to by the distinguished member from New York in the question he propounded to me a few moments back? That simply says that the general election of certain State officers shall be held on the second Tuesday of October. It does not refer either by words or by general intendment to the congressional election. If the gentleman will look at the clause again, and dissociate it from the code, he must see that he cannot by any stretch of construction bring the election of Congressmen within its purview. It simply provides that a general election of designated State officers shall be held on this second Tuesday of October.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether I understand his argument to imply this: that, taking the law of West Virginia as shown in this report, and the provision of the constitution that the general election of State and county officers and of members of the Legislature shall be held on the second Tuesday of October, and the old provision of the code that the general elections of members of Congress shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October—does he hold that in these two provisions of the constitution and of the statutes there is to be in the year 1874 a general election of one class of officers on the second Tuesday of October, and a general election of another class of officers on the fourth Thursday of October?

Mr. LAMAR. I think clearly so; and I think the argument of my friend from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] on yesterday, demonstrated that the election is split in two; and that there are some officers, district officers, for instance, that must be elected on the fourth Thursday of October. But whether there are to be two general elections in October or not, the congressional election must be held on the fourth Thursday, until the Legislature or Congress shall alter the time.

Mr. HALE, of New York. A single question further in that connection. I would ask the gentleman whether he believes that it was the intention either of the constitutional convention of West Virginia or of the people of West Virginia, in ratifying that constitution, that there should be two general elections in one month?

Mr. LAMAR. I think that it is very clear that it was the intention of the law-makers that there should be a congressional election on the fourth Thursday of October. I think there can be no doubt whatever upon that point. As to what the intention was with regard to the general election I have not deemed it an appropriate matter of inquiry, inasmuch as I never considered the general election to have an inseparable connection with the congressional election. But I think that a convention must be held to intend that which they have ordained.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will my colleague upon the committee [Mr. LAMAR] take the opportunity to say to my colleague from New York [Mr. HALE] that there are some one thousand officers in the State of West Virginia who under this new constitution are district officers, and could not be elected under that constitutional provision on the second Tuesday of October?

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir; I cannot take the opportunity of doing so, for my friend has already said it with a force far beyond the happiest efforts of my humble powers. [Laughter.] Now, sir, if the member from New York [Mr. HALE] will give me his attention, as he has been doing so kindly hitherto, I will develop my theory of this provision of the code with reference to the October elections. It says:

> At the said elections * * * * in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, there shall be elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States, for the term beginning the 4th day of March next after the election, for every congressional district.

Now, what does "the said elections" refer to? I think the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] who is a lawyer, and I will concur in what that means.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] will be permitted to go on with his remarks.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I hope so, as he has been repeatedly interrupted.

Mr. LAMAR. I dislike to trespass upon the attention of the House any longer.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. There is a very large number of gentlemen who desire to participate in this debate.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I will not object if gentlemen desire the discussion to be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. LAMAR. I cannot tell. I will try to get through as soon as possible; but do not desire to add a word against the wish of any member.

No objection was made; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. LAMAR. I was saying when my time expired that the code prescribes that Congressmen shall be elected at "the said election." What is the said election? It is the one referred to in the first section, the general election to be held on the fourth Thursday in October. It refers to both time and occasion; neither singly. It meant that it should occur on the fourth Thursday, and that it should be held with the State election—the same machinery of inspectors, registrars, &c. Therefore there were two elements in the prescription. Under the imperative obligation of the Federal Constitution it fixed the element of time. Under the discretionary power of its own constitution it fixed the occasion. Time was the Federal element, paramount and peremptory. Occasion was the discretionary, and therefore the subordinate element. The convention repealed the subordinate discretionary element of occasion, and moved it to the second Tuesday in October. Its repealing power did not extend to the element of time for the congressional election; and it attempted not to exercise any such repealing power, but left that part prescribing the fourth Thursday of October unrepealed and operative.

But the member from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] says there was no authority for holding the election for Congressmen in October, for the reason that the law regulating the manner and providing the machinery for conducting it had reference to the election of State officers as distinguished from the Federal officers. And he asserts confidently that there was no obligation resting upon any one of the election officers to hold an election or to certify to an election on that day for Congressmen.

All this is pure assumption, and is utterly destitute of foundation. The code, so far from restricting the regulations for holding, conducting, and certifying to the general State election, expressly makes them applicable to "the elections provided for in this chapter."

In some of the sections specific regulations are made for the elections of Congressmen and presidential electors. Section 66 of that chapter says "where an election is held in any county for * * * a Representative in the Congress of the United States and electors for President and Vice-President," &c. It is unnecessary to follow this assertion any further.

There is one other view which I desire to present. Whatever doubts or differences may exist as to the day of the week and month prescribed in the code, there can be no doubt that the year for the congressional election is prescribed absolutely and independent of any event or occasion. It says:

> In the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, there shall be elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States, for the term beginning on the 4th day of March next after the election, for every congressional district.

Now, on what day of 1872 is this election to be held? Not on the second Tuesday of October, for we are unanimous that the constitutional provision prescribing that day for the general elections of State officers does not apply to the year 1872. Not to the fourth Thursday of August, for we have shown that the schedule did not prescribe that day for a congressional election. There is but one day on which it can be held; and that is the day on which the code fixes it, the fourth Thursday of October.

There is but one possible escape from this conclusion, and that is that the constitution of West Virginia has directly repealed and abrogated the legislative provision in the code prescribing the time of holding the congressional election; and has changed both the day and the year of holding the election of Representatives to Congress as prescribed in the code. This presents a direct and indisputable conflict of authority between the Legislature and the convention.

Indeed, sir, the validity of the August election cannot be claimed, nor that of the October election denied, without encountering this difficulty. Hence the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] quick to discern the difficulties of his position, and ever ready to meet them, in the remarks before referred to, said:

> Now, then, the question left for us to determine is, whether a constitutional convention, duly organized, can change the constitution and require an election to be holden on the day when that is ratified. That has been done so often in every Southern State that it establishes a precedent, at least. Then the question arises, whether that election day, so fixed, contravenes the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which says that the times and places of holding elections for members of Congress shall be fixed by the Legislature of the State. This was not fixed by the Legislature of the State technically, but by a constitutional convention authorized by the Legislature of the State to fix it, and it has been over and over again decided in this House that the word "Legislature" in that provision of the Constitution does not mean the technical Legislature, but that it means the law-making power of the State.

Other members maintaining the validity of the August election have taken the same position precisely. Now, sir, is the statement true that by the term "the Legislature," the Constitution meant simply the law-making power, without reference to the distinction between a convention which ordains organic law, and an ordinary Legislature which merely enacts statute law?

Certain it is that the distinction between the two was as well known at the adoption of the Constitution as at the present time; and that distinction is distinctly and repeatedly recognized in the text of the Constitution. The words "the Legislature" are used in the Constitution thirteen times. The word "convention" occurs in the Constitution and the accompanying resolutions four times. Whenever reference is made to the ordinary law-making power the term "Legislature" is employed, and when allusion is made to the power of making fundamental law the word "convention" is used. This shows that in requiring the Legislature to prescribe the time of holding the congressional election it meant to exclude the idea that a convention should be invested with that important power.

The question then arises, as stated by the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] has a convention, by virtue simply of its essential nature and functions, the right to change the day for a congressional election in a State whose Legislature has fixed it on that day? There is but one ground upon which such a power can be accorded to a convention; and that is the theory that a convention is the direct and immediate representative of the sovereign power of a State; or, to use a favorite phrase, that it is virtually the people themselves in convention assembled, and as such paramount to all the other agencies and departments of government. That being such a sovereign body, with the power to ordain constitutions, to make and unmake governments, it is really a legislature of unlimited powers, including the inherent authority to make both organic and statutory laws. This theory is in direct hostility to the true principles of American government.

A convention is not sovereign; it is only one of the many instruments and agencies of that absolute sovereignty which resides in the whole body of the people. The sovereignty thus residing in the mass of society requires separate and distinct organs for its exercise. For instance, to the electors the sovereign power of choosing the officers of government is delegated, but they can exercise no other attribute. They can neither make, adjudicate, nor execute laws. The Legislature is another repository of sovereign power, restricted, however, to that special function of government. So with the executive and judicial departments—each invested with a special attribute of sovereignty, and confined, respectively, to its exercise. So is the convention a department of government, and, like these other departments, acts under a delegation of power, and cannot rightfully go beyond the limits assigned to it.* Its proper function is to ordain the fundamental law, to legislate for the governors, as it is that of the Legislature to enact statute law and legislate for the governed. It is endowed with no other function; it cannot render a judgment, execute a criminal, or enact a statute. Convoked by the authority of the Legislature and chosen by the electors, it is the creature of two separate and distinct departments of government. If it possessed inherent sovereignty, paramount to the existing government, why is it dependent for its existence upon an act of one single department of that government? It is therefore, as I said at first, one of a number of representative bodies, responsible to the same constituent, and subject to the same limitation of powers. I conclude therefore, sir, that the Legislature is the only authority in a State which can prescribe the time for holding a congressional election—that neither a convention nor a people can by express provision or by indirect implication change the time so prescribed.

My strength is exhausted. I thank the House for its attention and indulgence.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, being wholly unaccustomed to speak in this House, but being one of the minority of the Committee on Elections, and perhaps in duty bound to present my reasons of dissent, and desiring to be brief and concise in stating my reasons for sustaining the August election, I will, with the indulgence of the House, confine myself to my manuscript.

The majority of the committee have decided that, by the law of West Virginia, the congressional election of 1872 was to be held on the fourth Thursday of October, and that, consequently, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Martin are entitled to seats in this House. The grounds on which the majority reach this conclusion are twofold—a part (the majority) holding that the first section of the West Virginia code of 1869 fixes, in terms, the time of holding the congressional elections, while the others base their judgment on the second section. I mention this not in the spirit of criticism, but that the House may give to the report and the conclusion of the majority that weight only to which it is entitled with these facts known.

The only legislative provision prescribing the time of holding the congressional election in West Virginia is, confessedly, to be found in the first and second sections of the code of West Virginia laws of 1869, and this contest turns upon the interpretation which we shall give to those two sections of law.

The first section reads as follows:

> The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

Now I think it clear that no reference is here made to Representatives in Congress. The chairman of the Committee on Elections, however, bases his argument on the theory that the words "district officers" in this section include and mean members of Congress; but in that view he is not, as I understand, sustained by any other member of the committee, nor was such a claim set up by the counsel who argued this case before the committee. I submit, however, that no one, with that section standing alone before him, would claim that it could refer to any other than such State, district, county, and township officers as were to be elected under and by virtue of State authority, and not of Federal authority, for the following reasons:

First, it is conceded that there were "district officers" (district judges) to be elected as a part of the official staff of the State, and therefore the ordinary and natural interpretation of the words would confine that section to that class of officers.

Secondly, it is well known that members of Legislatures and members of Congress, though officers in some senses, are not regarded in law as "officers," in the usual meaning of the word; and in order to show that the Legislature of West Virginia did not mean to refer by those words to members of Congress or members of the Legislature, I draw attention to the fact that, after enumerating "State, district, county, and township officers," the Legislature went on, immediately in the same sentence, and added the words "and members of the Legislature." If the Legislature intended to include legislative officers, it would not have added these words, because, if "officers" at all, "members of the Legislature" were either "county" or "district officers" of the State.

I therefore, without further argument, conclude that the words "district officers" in the first section referred alone to such officers as were to be elected under State, and not under Federal, authority; and I dismiss this part of the argument now for the further reason that I regard other arguments of the majority more formidable, and demanding our careful attention.

The second section provides that—

> At the said elections * * * in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, * * * a Representative in the Congress of the United States shall be elected in each congressional district.

Now, what is the true interpretation of that language when taken in connection with the first section? What did the Legislature mean by the words "at the said elections?" Did the Legislature by that language mean to prescribe a particular day or time independent of the occasion of the State election, or did it mean to prescribe or fix the State election as the occasion at which members of Congress should be elected and thereby prescribe the time of holding that election? I think the latter is the true interpretation of the statute, and for the following reasons:

First. That is the natural and ordinary meaning of the words "at said elections." Equivalent words would be "at the time of the State elections" or "at the general elections for State, district, county, and township officers," &c. The word "said" certainly points to "general elections" named in the first section; and, substituting for it the words which it points out, the section would read as follows: "At the general election for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, a Representative in Congress shall be elected for each congressional district." If that transposition be correct, the natural meaning of the two sections, taken together, is, that the occasion of the general election and not the particular date was what the Legislature intended to establish as the time for electing Representatives in Congress.

Secondly. The time for electing State officers had been fixed in the State constitution, but the details of the election law were revised in the code of 1869, and in prescribing the time of electing members of Congress, in order to avoid the excitement, trouble, and expense of two elections the same year, the Legislature saw proper to require the congressional election to be held at the time the State election should be held, and the date was of little or no consequence, while the occasion was of the first importance; and in order to carry out that general intent it was proper to prescribe an occasion rather than a particular day for the election.

Thirdly. The election law of 1863, which was repealed by the code of 1869, did prescribe a date certain for the election of Congressmen; and the Legislature having changed the language of the law, it is presumed that there was a design in changing the language; and inasmuch as no other object is perceptible, I argue that the object in making the change of the language was to change the congressional election from a time definite to an occasion.

Fourthly. For many years in the State of Virginia, from which West Virginia was taken, the time of electing members of Congress had been prescribed by fixing an occasion, rather than a particular date, of the year. That occasion was the first day of the county court, in April. For nearly forty years the first day of the county court in April was the day of electing members of Congress in Virginia, and though the date of the county court was many times changed in many of the counties, yet the election day without any new legislation followed the court day, and shifted as the occasion shifted, and the Legislature of West Virginia being familiar with that fact could readily see the advantage of shifting that election from a specific date to an occasion which must necessarily recur every year.

Therefore I claim, as my first proposition, that the Legislature did prescribe or fix the time for electing Representatives in Congress by prescribing an occasion rather than any particular or absolute date independent of the occasion; and as a corollary to the proposition I say that in case of conflict between the parts of the sections, the general and primary intent shall prevail over the secondary intent.

In the second place, I inquire whether prescribing the time by fixing upon an occasion is a compliance with the Federal Constitution, which requires the Legislatures of the States to prescribe the times, &c., of electing members of Congress. It is a maxim of law that that is certain which can be rendered certain. But this question, if it were doubtful on principle, is settled by a long line of precedents.

In Virginia, in February, 1813, it was enacted as follows, namely:

> And be it further enacted, That the persons qualified by law to vote for members of the House of Delegates in each county, city, and borough composing a district, shall assemble at their respective court-houses, or other places appointed by law for holding elections, on the first day of their April court in the year 1813; also, on the first day of their April court in every second year thereafter, and then and there vote for some discreet and proper person qualified according to the Constitution of the United States, as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

This law was in force for nearly forty years, and its legality was never questioned; and the time of the April court was shifted from time to time, yet the election followed the occasion without any further legislation.

In Kentucky, in 1802, it was enacted as follows:

> The next succeeding election shall be held for Representatives to Congress at the general election in the State, in 1804, and every second year thereafter forever.

In Louisiana, in 1841, it was provided that—

> All subsequent elections for a Representative or Representatives from this State to the Congress of the United States, shall be holden on the day appointed by law for the election of representatives to the General Assembly of the State.

In New Jersey, in 1820, it was enacted that—

> Representatives in Congress shall be elected at the same time with members of the State Legislature, sheriffs, and coroners, except when the electors of President and Vice-President are to be chosen as hereinafter directed. And in every fourth year, when electors are to be chosen, the Representatives in Congress shall be elected at the same time with the electors.

Substantially the same provisions were made in Delaware, South Carolina, and some other States; and certainly, after such a line of precedents, the question must be a settled one.

Therefore I assume, as the second proposition of my argument, that this mode of prescribing the time is a substantial compliance with the requirements of the Federal Constitution, which provides that—

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof.

Having shown that the West Virginia Legislature had the constitutional right to prescribe an occasion as the time, and that it had prescribed the occasion of "the general election for State, district, county, and township officers and members of the Legislature" as the time for electing members of Congress, I inquire, in the third place, where was the general election in 1872 held, or to be held, in West Virginia? I answer—

First. It could not be held on the fourth Thursday of October because before that time the old constitution had been swept away, as well as all laws contravening the new constitution; and, as all the offices authorized by the new constitution had been filled by the election in August, there was no provision for, or any need of, any further election for State or other officers that year.

Secondly. I claim that the August election was the general election of State, district, county, and township officers, and of members of the Legislature. Because, first, all of these officers were in fact elected at that time throughout the State, and it was general as to its objects and its participants; and, secondly, that election was held in the same manner, under the direction of the same officers, and had all of the characteristics of every State election.

Thirdly. No other State election was in fact held that year, nor could there be any other, for the reason that there were no officers to be elected within the State, nor was there any law for one.

It is true the vote was on the same day taken on the adoption of the constiution, but that vote had no influence in giving character to the election of that day for State, district, and county officers. The State election might have been held the next day, or any other day, after the constitution had been adopted, and it would have had the same characteristics precisely as it had being held on the 22d of August, and the same question of construction as to the right to elect Congressmen would have come before this House as now, and in precisely the same form. The only reason it was held on the 22d day of August was to avoid the excitement, trouble, and expense of a second election that year.

Therefore, I claim that the general election for the year 1872 was held on the 22d of August, and of right should have been held on that day, and therefore Mr. Davis and Mr. Hagans, having received a clear majority of the votes in the first and second districts at the election for members of Congress held on that day, are entitled to be admitted to this House.

But it is objected that the effect of this argument is to enable a constitutional convention of the State, instead of the Legislature of the State, to prescribe the time of electing members of Congress. I think not. I do not see how that question is involved in this contest. We do not claim that the new constitution changed the time of electing members of Congress, but that it simply changed the date of the occasion which the Legislature of the State had previously prescribed as the time of the congressional election. The distinction is a clear one, and as the convention had the legal right to change the date of holding the State election for State, district, and county officers, and members of the Legislature, as it did, it must, as a matter of law, have been within the intention, and not against the intention, of the Legislature that whenever that State election was in this or any legal manner changed to August or November, then the congressional election should shift with the change thus made.

Again, it is claimed that the time was not prescribed beforehand. The many cases cited in the minority report show that this objection has been overruled by a long line of precedents. So that question is no longer an open one.

The word "prescribe" has no technical meaning as used in the constitution, but means "establish." The object of the provision was to give to the States, instead of the United States, authority to fix or establish the times of electing members of Congress.

It is well known that no election of any kind can be held without first prescribing the rules as to time and place and manner to govern it. Now, if the time for the State election was "prescribed" by the schedule in such certainty beforehand as to make it a valid election for State purposes, it, by the force of logic, became the prescribed time beforehand for the congressional election.

Nor could the fact that the election might be defeated by a defect of the constitution have anything to do with the character or prescription of the time of the election, which was held precisely in the same way. It would have been held the next or any succeeding day of the year.

By the law of construction of days and parts of days, and by the terms of the schedule itself, the constitution, if adopted, should be in force all of the 22d of August, and hence there was no condition pending on the morning of the 22d, when the polls were opened for the election of State, county, and district officers, members of the Legislature, and Representatives in Congress, but in law the constitution was then adopted and in full operation. Although not known to mean so all of the objections are removed, as they are examined, one after another.

I deem it neither proper nor necessary to consider or refer to the facts in this case outside of the law question involved, for they were not considered by the committee, nor can they be by this House as the case now stands.

Believing that by law the congressional election was August 22, I shall vote for the resolutions offered by the minority of the committee.

I now yield ten minutes to my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD.]

Mr. SMITH, of New York. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose, I would move an adjournment.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not wish to interfere with members as to assignment of the floor under the rules of the House, but he would remark that there is great pressure on the Chair for opportunities on the part of members of the Committee on Elections to speak. The Chair suggests that the rules of the House give to a committee making a report the first right to the floor; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROBINSON] is entitled clearly to an hour in his own right. But if that gentleman has no disposition to occupy his hour, the Chair suggests that the balance of his time should go to other members of the Committee on Elections before gentlemen who are not members of the committee are heard. That would be in accordance with the groundwork of the rules of the House on this subject.

Mr. DANFORD. Then I consent to yield the floor after that statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the gentleman would do so.

Mr. POLAND. Unless the Committee on Elections choose to go on longer with the discussion of this question, I will move that the House take a recess until half-past seven. If the committee choose to go on with the discussion now, I will not press the motion.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. May I be allowed to make a suggestion in connection with what has just been stated by the Chair? The time of both of the gentlemen who have spoken for the majority has been extended very considerably, and it does seem to me that under the circumstances it is not asking anything unreasonable, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROBINSON] does not see fit to occupy more than half his hour, that he should be permitted to give ten minutes of it to his colleague, [Mr. DANFORD.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. My colleague also proposes to assign to me twenty minutes of his time, and I hope I will be allowed to have the floor for that time.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. That would be only giving us as much time as the other side have had.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I have made a motion that the House adjourn. If the House is not prepared to adjourn, I hope my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, will be allowed to assign the time as he pleases.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I desire that my colleague [Mr. DANFORD] may be allowed to speak now.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Then I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. DANFORD. I shall not occupy more than ten minutes of the time if possible. My reason for occupying any time is that I live opposite the city of Wheeling. My constituents have a considerable interest in this question; I was engaged to some extent in the canvass of 1872 in the State of West Virginia. I know the feeling, the excitement, and the issues of that campaign. I know that all parties in the first district of West Virginia regarded the fourth Thursday of August as the day upon which they should elect their Representative to the Forty-third Congress. They went through the canvass with that feeling and that understanding. And after the election, two days after, the friends of Mr. Wilson, who now appears here contesting the seat of his competitor, (Mr. Davis,) in the Wheeling Register, referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON,] stuck at the head of their paper the figure of a bird, familiar, I have no doubt, to those who read democratic newspapers when announcements of democratic victories are made. It was not until after the returns of the mountain districts had come in, and had determined the election in favor of Mr. Davis, that there was any question in the minds of any of the people of West Virginia as to when was the proper time for holding the election for members of Congress.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by the Legislatures." Not alone the time, but the place, and the manner also. It is not sufficient that the Legislature shall prescribe the time, the day upon which the election of members of Congress shall be held, but it must go further and prescribe the manner, whether they shall be elected by ballot, whether the electors shall assemble at the court-house, &c. All these requirements of the Constitution of the United States the Legislature of West Virginia complied with in the code of 1869, by enacting that at the said elections in every year, that is at the general election for State, district, and county officers, "at the said elections in every year there shall be elected delegates to the Legislature," in every year. "And in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, a governor, secretary of state, and member of Congress." A member of Congress is to be elected by the law of the State of West Virginia, a law that has been enacted by the requirements of the Constitution of the United States.

A member of Congress is not only to be elected at the general election, but he has to be elected at the time the people assemble to elect the governor—at the time the people assemble to elect other State officers designated in the second section of this act. The Constitution of the United States requires that the Legislature shall prescribe the time. I ask, gentlemen, whether it would not be a full compliance with the requirement of the Constitution of the United States for the Legislature of the State of West Virginia to prescribe that members of Congress shall be elected in 1872, and every second year thereafter, at the time of holding the general State election.

And if that be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, then what further is to be required? If that be a compliance with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, then in providing in the code of West Virginia that members of Congress shall be elected at the general election at the time the people assemble to elect a governor and a secretary of state, is not that a full compliance with these requirements?

And yet the singular argument is made upon the other side that by the provisions of the schedule submitting the constitution of 1872 to the people for their ratification, the general election was split in two. It is conceded by the reports of those who favor seating Messrs. Wilson and Martin, that the schedule, or rather the people in ratifying the constitution of 1872, did change in part the time for holding the general election. It does seem to me that, to put this case within a very narrow scope, when this proposition is conceded the entire argument is conceded. If there was power to change the time for holding the general election, then the election of members of Congress, which hinged on this general election, is carried with it to whatever time the new constitution may change it.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANFORD. I would rather not be interrupted, as I am new to this House.

I am speaking of the reports of the committee. The election in October, 1872, was held by virtue of what law? It was not held by virtue of a proclamation of the governor of West Virginia. It was held, if held at all, in compliance with the statute of West Virginia that had fixed the day for holding the general election in compliance with the old constitution of that State. And the old constitution of that State passed away on the fourth Thursday of August, and from that day until this it has had no validity, no force, no power in West Virginia.

If, as has been conceded by the reports of the members of the committee who favor seating Messrs. Wilson and Martin in this House, there was power in the constitutional convention of West Virginia, or in the sovereign people of West Virginia, to change the time for holding the general election, I cannot see how any gentleman can read the code of West Virginia of 1869 without coming at once to the conclusion that the members of Congress should be elected when the governor is to be elected, at the same time, in the same manner, and at the same places.

There is no provision of the Legislature of West Virginia that the people shall meet upon a certain day at the court-house, and that they shall prepare printed ballots, and shall vote for candidates for Congress; that those votes shall be counted; and that the one receiving the greater number of votes shall be declared elected. There is no law, and never has been, of this character upon the statute-book of West Virginia. The Legislature of West Virginia considered that it was a sufficient prescribing of the time, and place, and manner to say that members of Congress shall be elected at the general election. And elected how? At the same time, the same places, and in the same manner as the State officers to be elected in the year 1870, and every two years following, shall be elected.

I see that I have already trespassed on the courtesy of my colleague beyond the time allowed me, and I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I yield the balance of my time to my colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is very evident that we will not be able to take a vote on this question to-night. I propose to occupy the time assigned to me to-morrow, and would now move that the House take a recess.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the House will not take a recess yet. There are several members of the committee who desire to speak.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They will have an opportunity of speaking to-morrow.

Mr. SPEER. There are more gentlemen desiring to speak than will find time to-morrow.

SHOSHONE AND BANNOCK INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to articles of convention concluded with the chiefs and head-men of the Shoshone and Bannock Indians for the relinquishment of a portion of their reservation in Wyoming Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till half-past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873." The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEER. Has the reading of the bill been dispensed with?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill has had two readings.

Mr. SPEER. In full?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By title. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. DURHAM. I understood one of the committee who had this branch of the subject under consideration said he could vouch for the correctness of the balance of this title; and if there is no objection I move that the balance of this title be read only by the titles of the chapters.

Mr. POLAND. The committee, I believe, proposes a slight amendment in section 89.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no objection be made the reading of the sections with the exception of section 89 will be omitted.

Mr. CONGER. I make no objection to passing over these sections, if the understanding is that they are not finally passed. Let it be understood that we can go back to them if necessary.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think it would be a good suggestion to make to the House that if any gentleman at any future time when we are going on with our revision, shall find any error—that is, anything which is now law is not incorporated, or that anything which is not law now is added—and will communicate that discovery or supposed discovery to any member of the committee, they will introduce an amendment in correspondence with the discovery, unless they can show to the gentleman that it is not as he supposes. I think that with this understanding we could probably make very much more rapid progress. Of course if any error should be discovered at any stage of our proceedings, we should be glad to have the error pointed out, in order that our work may be as perfect as possible.

Mr. CONGER. That would be a very good suggestion if it were understood that it is not to depend entirely on the committee to make the proposition.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. We do not propose to limit the right to members of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. If it be understood that we may go back in this way to sections that have been passed, I have no objection to considering as passed those sections which the committee have more particularly examined.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the proposition. Unanimous consent is asked that it shall be considered in order to go back to any section which has been passed, upon the statement of any member that he has discovered the revision to be incorrect in that section. With this understanding, if there be no objection, the Clerk will read the eighty-ninth section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 89. The Joint Committee upon the Library may, at any time, exchange for foreign books or works, or otherwise dispose of duplicate, injured, or wasted books of the Library, or documents, or any other matter in the Library not deemed proper to it, as they deem best.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. On behalf of the committee I move to amend by striking out the words "for foreign books or works." Those words are entirely unnecessary, as the section gives power to make exchanges in any manner that may be deemed proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. I suggest whether "title 3" may not be treated in the same way as others have been—whether the reading of it may not be dispensed with upon the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] that it is all correct to his certain knowledge except in such particulars as may be affected by amendments which he proposes to submit.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There are one or two corrections which we desire to submit, but none in the first chapter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the first chapter will be considered as passed, and the Clerk will read chapter 2 by its title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

Office and compensation of the President.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. We propose to submit an amendment to section 156.

The section was read, as follows:

SEC. 156. The President shall receive in full for his services during the term for which he shall have been elected the sum of $50,000 a year, and shall be entitled to the use of the furniture and other effects belonging to the United States and kept in the Executive Mansion.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. On the part of the committee, I move to insert after the word "year," in line 3, the words "to be paid monthly."

Mr. SPEER. Is not this amendment a change in the existing law?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. No, sir; the words have been omitted by an error of the printer. They should have been included in this section, as they are in that relating to the Vice-President.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This change is found in the table of errata.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The committee have no other amendment to propose in chapter 2.

The Clerk read under the next title, "Provisions applicable to all the Executive Departments," the following:

SEC. 162. The word "Department," when used alone in this title, and titles 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, means one of the Executive Departments enumerated in the preceding section.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to inquire whether the Department of Agriculture is not recognized in the existing laws as one of the Departments?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It is not an Executive Department.

Mr. CONGER. But does it not come in under some of these titles?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There is a suitable title for it; but the provisions now under consideration are applicable to the Executive Departments, the heads of which are Cabinet officers.

Mr. CONGER. The purport of my question is whether the word "Department," as applied to the Department of Agriculture, may not occur in one of these titles—5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It might, but I believe it does not.

Mr. CONGER. That is the point—whether it does or not. If it does, this would treat it as one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let me make an inquiry. The head-notes of the chapters are not read; but where they contain errors is it not well to correct them as we go along, lest the errors should creep into the final publication? In the last head-line of this title the word "State" should be "Interior;" so as to make the passage read thus:

Biennial lists of persons employed in each Department to be filed in Department of the Interior.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The portions to which the gentleman refers are no part of the bill; and it is not in order to make any motion in regard to them.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 163. Each head of a Department is entitled to a salary of $10,000 a year, to be paid monthly.

Mr. SPEER. Let me inquire whether the repeal of the salary law does not reduce the salaries of the heads of the Departments from $10,000 to $8,000.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Certainly; but we are embodying the law as it was on the 1st day of last December. There are several incongruous provisions which the legislation of this section will rectify.

Mr. SPEER. This is to be a codification of the law as it stood on the 1st of last December.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That was stated last evening. We cannot undertake to incorporate the legislation from day to day into this great volume.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will see that by the title we have adopted—"An act to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, 1873."

Mr. SPEER. Is it not intended to bring this revision down to the day of the passage of this bill?

Mr. POLAND. The purpose is to have a revision of the statutes in force on the first day of this session. It was quite fully explained last night. It would be utterly impossible to weave into it the daily legislation of Congress.

Mr. SPEER. I was not in the House last evening when the explanation was made.

Mr. POLAND. Therefore all the legislation subsequent to the 1st day of December is to be an alteration of the law as we will leave it.

Mr. DURHAM. I inquire whether the reading of this, too, cannot be dispensed with?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There is an amendment to be made in the next section.

Mr. DURHAM. Of course, except as you propose to amend it.

Mr. McCRARY. There is no possibility, and, indeed, there is no necessity, for reading this entire volume through; and when we reach the beginning of each chapter I see no objection to making a general order to read the title only and such sections as may be designated, in reference to which there may be some amendment to be offered, either by the committee or by any gentleman upon the floor. And to carry out that suggestion I propose to make the following order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the title of the chapter shall be read when reached in order, and it shall be only necessary to read such sections as may be designated for reading by some member, or to which some amendment may be suggested.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that by unanimous consent we follow that idea in our proceedings on this bill, without adopting any definite proposition on the subject like that which the gentleman has offered. There will manifestly be no objection to adopting that line of proceeding, for it is clearly the best policy to pursue; but I do not see the necessity for adopting any order on the subject like that which has been proposed.

Mr. McCRARY. I am not particular how the object is accomplished. I suppose, unless an order be made, any gentleman, unless there be unanimous consent all the time, can interrupt this proceeding at any time.

Mr. CONGER. I will ask the Clerk to read section 166.

Mr. POLAND. So far as the committee are concerned they prefer no order should be made, but that we proceed by unanimous consent. We have no reason to suppose that every member of the House is not anxious to get on with this work as speedily and as well as it can be done. I think we had better trust ourselves to the House than to have any order made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will it be understood by unanimous consent that the idea of the gentleman from Iowa is acquiesced in?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to object.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the contrary I am in favor of it, but do not think it is necessary to adopt any order.

Mr. POLAND. The committee will take this course, if satisfactory to the House: whenever we reach any chapter, we will only read the title and any sections to which amendments are suggested; then if nobody desires a chapter to be read, its reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. McCRARY. I withdraw my proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will, with the leave of the House, submit the proposition. It will be observed by members of the House there is less than a quorum present, and unless some order be adopted like that suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, our whole future proceedings will have to be by unanimous consent; so that the objection of any member may stop our proceedings, if we proceed in accordance with the statement of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. POLAND.]

Mr. McCRARY. On the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, I withdraw my proposition, as he states that he will proceed as I have suggested, without any order of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless some order is adopted, under the rules of the House any member may require the reading of any chapter of the bill; so that nothing will be gained by the course suggested by the gentleman from Vermont. If the House wishes to adopt the course suggested, an order had better be adopted to that effect.

Mr. CONGER. I believe it is understood by common consent that we shall proceed in the course proposed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the Clerk will proceed to report the bill as has been proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 165. From the first day of October until the first day of April, in each year, all the Bureaus and offices in the Departments shall be open for the transaction of the public business at least eight hours in each day; and from the first day of April until the first day of October, in each year, at least ten hours in each day; except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to insert before the word "Departments" in line 2 the words "State, War, Treasury, Navy, and Post-Office." The reason for the amendment is that the statutes creating the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice passed after the passage of this act, and no such provision was made in the statutes incorporating those Departments.

It is an instance where the law as it is is not uniform, and perhaps it would be desirable that it should be; but the committee consider that they are confined by the existing statutes to the terms of this amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would like to ask, if in the acts creating the Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior there is anything said as to business hours; whether that would not, as a matter of law, come under the general provisions of this law?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It is not a general law applying to all Departments of the Government, but a law applying to certain Departments, as laid down in the statutes which created them. At the same time I may say that that law as it stands has been disregarded by every Department in Washington, and has become almost obsolete.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This, then, is a case of omission in the statutes creating these Departments, and not in the revision itself.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The original laws in reference to each of the Departments except the last two, contained this provision, and it is not contained in the laws creating those two.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then it is a special provision in the act creating each Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following section:

SEC. 166. The clerks in the Departments shall be arranged in four classes, distinguished as the first, second, third, and fourth classes.

Mr. POLAND. There should be, in my judgment, a further amendment of section 165. My recollection is, that this provision is found in the act creating the Land Office, and that it applies in terms to that Bureau. I think that in addition to these Departments, the Land Office should also be named.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman move that amendment?

Mr. POLAND. My recollection is very strong that this provision of the law is found in the act creating the Land Office, and that that should be inserted here. I will not offer an amendment now, however, but will call the attention of the House to the matter again.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. This provision, as I understand, does not apply to any of the subordinate departments, but only to the Executive Departments, and the Land Office is not one of those.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The Land Office has this peculiarity: Gentlemen will notice that this section provides for the keeping open not only of the Departments but of each of the bureaus subordinate to them; and the Land Office, which was originally created as a separate office, without being a Department, was afterwards merged in the Department of the Interior when that Department was created; and the Department of the Interior when thus created did not have any regulation as to the times it should be kept open. This makes an embarrassment of the question in regard to that provision, and the committee asks, for that reason, that it be passed over for the present.

The Clerk proceeded to read section 167, as follows:

SEC. 167. No clerk shall be appointed in any Department in either of the four classes above designated, until he has been examined and found qualified by a board or three examiners, to consist of the chief of the Bureau or office into which such clerk is to be appointed, and two other clerks to be selected by the head of the Department.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear section 166 read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Section 166 was read.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have it read again.

Section 166 was again read.

Mr. CONGER. When I called for the reading of this section I had an impression that the Department of Agriculture was one of the Departments included among those to which these sections apply. I find it is in title 12; and therefore the definition of "Department" in a previous section would not apply to the Department of Agriculture. I have no occasion, therefore, to make the remarks I intended to make.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the committee desire the reading of the whole title? It was proposed to omit the reading of the whole title except such sections as the committee desires to amend.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. We have no further amendment to make that I am aware of in this whole title, except in section 193.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read section 193.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 193. It shall not be lawful for any person appointed after the 1st day of June, 1872, as an officer, clerk, or employé in any of the Department, to act as counsel, attorney, or agent for prosecuting any claim against the United States which was pending in said Department while he was such officer, clerk, or employé, nor in any manner nor by any means to aid in the prosecution of any such claim within two years next after he shall have ceased to be such officer, clerk, or employé.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. This is one of the few cases, so far as my examination has gone, and I believe the examination of any of the committee, in which the commission appointed to revise the statutes and the gentlemen employed to review their work have differed slightly or doubted in regard to the meaning of the statute. The committee have carefully considered it, and were unanimously of the opinion that it should stand in the form in which the revising commission left it. I therefore move, as an amendment in line 3, to add the letter "s" to "Department"—that is obviously merely a typographical error—and in line 5 to insert, between the words "in" and "said," the words "either of," and to add the letter "s" to "Department" in that line, so that it will read:

Officer, clerk, or employé in any of the Departments to act as counsel, attorney, or agent for prosecuting any claim against the United States which was pending in either of said Departments, &c.

The effect, as the House will see, of this amendment is that any person who has been employed in either of the Departments shall not be allowed within the time specified to practice as a claim agent within any of the Departments, which the committee thought was the true construction of the law as it stood, and certainly a very salutary one.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was proposed, and the reading of the remainder of the title was dispensed with.

The Clerk read the heading of the next title, as follows:

TITLE 5. The Department of State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read only such sections under this title as the committee or any member of the House may request to be read for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The amendments which will now be proposed go through quite a number of the chapters. The first occurs in the chapter now before the House, in section 204.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 204. The subordinate officers, clerks, and employés of the Department of State, and their respective salaries, shall be as follows:

One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500 a year; chief of the Diplomatic Bureau, at a salary of $2,400 a year; chief of the Consular Bureau, at a salary of $2,400 a year; chief of the Bureau of Accounts, at a salary of $2,400 a year; chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives, at a salary of $2,400 a year; six clerks of class four, of whom one may be appointed disbursing clerk; nine clerks of class three; three clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; one messenger; one assistant messenger; four watchmen; nine laborers.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If gentlemen will turn to section 172, which we have already passed without amendment, they will see that it reads as follows:

SEC. 172. Each head of a Department is authorized to employ in his Department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employés, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

The House will find in the chapter under consideration an enumeration of a considerable number of clerks. They will find page after page of similar enumerations in the chapters relating to other Departments. It seemed to the committee, and I do not know but I can say that it finally seemed to all gentlemen connected with this revision, as I understand it seemed to the commissioners, that it was necessary to put into the general statutes, after the provision for the four classes of clerks a provision that there should be as many of each of them and at such salaries as Congress should make an appropriation for by law from year to year; it seemed unnecessary and improper to put in schedules of the numbers of clerks which might now be found employed under the last appropriation bill. It was only upon a question, which I will state, that the very careful reviewers of the labors of the commissioners inserted these lists.

The number of these clerks has fluctuated from year to year; it has diminished or increased according to the exigencies of the public service. The doubt in regard to them arises from statutes which, by the practice of Congress, have been obsolete for about twenty years. In the reorganization of the Departments there was some propriety in this enumeration. The employment and appointment of clerks and the distribution of their compensation in the early periods of the Government were practically intrusted to the heads of Departments. With the increase of the public business and the increase of the number of persons employed more attention was given to the provision in the statutes or in acts of appropriation, but it was in a very loose and imperfect way.

By the statute of 1818, volume 3, page 455, the number as well as the compensation of the clerks was regulated and fixed. And from that time Congress supplied temporary deficiencies. It is sometimes difficult to ascertain whether a provision shall be considered permanent or temporary in its character.

In 1853 the whole subject came before Congress upon the report of a committee raised to inquire into the number and pay of the clerks in the several Departments. And the acts of 1853 and 1855 were passed, arranging the clerks into classes—a classification that is now preserved—and fixing the compensation of each. And from that time the general appropriation bills, or clauses in statutes relating to particular kinds of business, have sometimes made provision in regard to clerks which might affect their number. But practically, for this long series of years, Congress has annually in its appropriation bills settled this whole matter of the number and compensation of the clerks in the several Departments. Now, the committee understand that by this course, thus long continued, Congress has determined that it will keep in its own hands the regulation from year to year of those clerks who are simply classified clerks and not clerks intrusted with specific duties. We propose, therefore, to retain in this chapter the chief clerks, the appointment clerks, the disbursing clerks, and any clerks who have a separate duty to perform or separate compensations specifically assigned at the time; and then leave the rest, without any enumeration, to the operation of the section which has already been adopted, that is, section 172.

The amendments which this conclusion of the committee requires are numerous and extensive, and will save us, I think, about ten pages of print in this volume of revised statutes. It is first proposed to amend section 204 by striking out the first three lines, "The subordinate officers, clerks, and employés of the Department of State, and their respective salaries, shall be as follows:" and insert in lieu thereof the words, "There shall also be in the Department of State." Then change lines 14 and 15 so as to read "one disbursing clerk;" and strike out the remainder or the section. The section thus amended will read:

There shall also be in the Department of State:

One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,500 a year; chief of the Diplomatic Bureau, at a salary of $2,400 a year; chief of the Consular Bureau, at a salary of $2,400 a year; chief of the Bureau of Accounts, at a salary of $2,400 a year; chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives, at a salary of $2,400 a year; one disbursing clerk.

Mr. CONGER. The proposition here is a very radical one, and more far-reaching in its consequences, as it seems to me, than the committee may perceive. Under the present law, and under the present rule, the Committee on Appropriations have no right to make an appropriation for the salary or compensation of any officer not authorized by law. And if these officers enumerated and provided by law be stricken out, unless that rule is altered, the Committee on Appropriations cannot make any appropriation, and cannot create, from time to time, these offices.

I have had occasion within the last two years and a half to devote a great many hours—I may say a great many days—of continuous labor to searching the laws now in force, to ascertain what number of clerks and other officers were, by law, authorized to be employed in the Treasury Department, and in some of the other Departments of this Government, and to ascertain what salaries they were entitled to receive by the laws now in force. And with the utmost care, and the utmost diligence, and with the assistance of officers of the Treasury Department, hour after hour, I confess that I was unable, as a member of the Committee on Reorganization of the Departments in the last Congress to determine what officers and employés in the Department were provided for by the laws alone. With the most careful search, such as this committee have undoubtedly given to each section and each chapter, I found it impossible in preparing a law for the reorganization of the Treasury Department, with all the assistance which the Secretary of the Treasury, the heads of Bureaus, chief clerks, and others could afford me, to find the exact provisions of law for the various officers and employés, and their salaries.

In the course of that investigation I was led to the conclusion that one of the most important services this Congress could render the Government, one of the most decided advances in the direction of civil-service reform, would be to embody in a new act the name and class of every officer and employé of this Government, from the head of a Department down to the porter in its halls. In my opinion whenever we shall have accomplished a revision of the organization of all our Departments, whenever we shall have attained a distinct designation, fully expressed in the provisions of one law, of every officer, with his salary, we shall have done more to remove the cause of uncertainty, and I may say insecurity, in the management of the several Departments than can be accomplished by any other method of civil-service reform that can possibly be invented.

I make these remarks now because they seem applicable to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I deem it important that in this revision of the laws as they stood on the 1st of December of last year it should be plain to every one who may look at the compilation what officers are employed in different Departments, what are their classes or ranks, and what salaries they receive. This would be a starting point for the reforms which are so essentially necessary, and which I hope will soon be made. Whatever may be the changes of these officers from time to time, there should be a fixed, continuous, standing law, naming every officer and employé, with his salary; so that the status of each Department in this respect may be readily ascertained. Let me say further that I object very earnestly to leaving out in this revision the slightest provision which would tend to exhibit fully the officers and employés in the different Departments as they were when these laws were compiled.

Mr. POLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask whether any gentleman of the committee can inform the House and the country of the exact number of employés authorized under existing law in the various Executive Departments of the Government.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will not reply to my friend's question just at this moment, but will before I get through.

A MEMBER. No one can give that information.

Mr. POLAND. I do not precisely understand (though I have tried to do so) what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] would have us do. What we are now aiming at is that this volume shall exhibit what the law is upon this subject. Now, I understood my friend to say that he would have us make it appear in this volume of permanent statutes how many people are employed in all these Departments.

Mr. CONGER. By law.

Mr. POLAND. By law. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] has said, this subject of the clerks and other employés in the Departments had fallen into its present loose condition prior to 1853. In that year Congress appointed a committee for the very purpose of reorganizing the Departments, and providing how many clerks, and of what classes, each Department should consist of or be authorized to employ. I have taken some little pains to make a collation of them from that act of 1853. In the Treasury Department the whole number of clerks of all classes authorized to be employed was three hundred and twenty; and I apprehend that if we are to set forth in this volume the law creating standing clerkships, offices that are to continue beyond a mere employment from year to year under an appropriation bill, we must put down the number in the Treasury Department at three hundred and twenty. I have here a list of the number authorized by law in each of the Departments. I may as well refer in detail to this list. The entire number of clerks allowed to the War Department in all its different branches and Bureaus—in the office of the General-in-Chief, the Adjutant-General, the Quartermaster-General, the Paymaster-General, the Commissary-General, the Surgeon-General, the Colonel of Engineers, the Colonel of Topographical Engineers, and the Colonel of Ordnance—the entire number allowed in the War Department and all its branches was sixty-one. The Navy Department was authorized to have in all its branches and Bureaus twenty-nine clerks. The Interior Department in all its branches, including the Land Office, the Patent Office, the Pension Office, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, was authorized to have two hundred and one clerks. The entire force of clerks authorized in the Postmaster-General's Department was seventy-eight. In that act the State Department was not provided for, but in 1855 they passed an act providing what force might be employed in the State Department, and the State Department was authorized to have in all twenty-one clerks, one of whom should be a disbursing clerk.

Mr. SPEER. Is not the actual number of clerks in the employ of the Departments five times, and perhaps ten times, as large as the number you have read?

Mr. POLAND. I was going to say that while we have been examining this subject and endeavoring to get some law on the subject, I visited the Treasury Department and called on an official there whose position was such as to make him more familiar with the number of persons employed there under the law than anybody else. I inquired of him whether he knew how many persons were authorized to be employed in that Department by law. He said he had no definite idea about it, but he supposed some three or four hundred. "Well, how many have you in all in this Department?" "Between twenty-five hundred and three thousand." I had heard the distinction between permanent clerks and temporary clerks, and I inquired of the Treasury Department in reference to their permanent roll—whether that was understood to cover such clerkships, such number of persons as they were authorized by any standing and permanent law to have. To that it was said, that was a matter which had never entered into their consideration; that a certain number was regularly appropriated for year after year whom they had on their permanent roll; and their permanent roll is four times as much as any statute creating permanent clerkships would authorize. So the committee came to the conclusion that the only thing they could do was to provide for certain valuable clerks, chief clerks and disbursing clerks, upon whom the law devolved specific duties, and say what is the law on this subject for now twenty years at least. These Departments should be authorized to employ such number of clerks, and of such classes as actually should be provided for by act of Congress.

Mr. SPEER. Do I understand the gentleman from Vermont to say there were at least four times as many clerks employed in these Departments as were authorized by law?

Mr. POLAND. No, sir; but by any general standing law. They are authorized by these temporary laws, by appropriation bills passed from year to year; and it is from these appropriation bills these lists have been obtained which have been put in here. And the effect of passing this revision, with this list in, would be to make them all permanent clerks, which the committee think is not the law and should not be done.

Mr. SPEER. Do I understand, then, it is the aim of the amendments to reduce the number of clerks employed, or is it to continue under the heads of Departments the employment of this large number of clerks?

Mr. POLAND. What the committee proposes to do is this: There are certain clerks in the Departments for whom the law provides. The law provides for chief clerks for the First and Second Comptrollers. It provides that the Auditors shall each have a chief clerk. In all the Bureaus there is a provision of law for a chief clerk. There is also provision in the permanent statute for disbursing clerks. We propose to incorporate every one of those clerkships where specific duty is devolved upon them by law, and in reference to the general body of clerks to say that each Department shall have so many clerks as Congress shall annually appropriate for. That we believe to be the practical law on the subject.

Mr. SPEER. Will the passage of this bill take from the heads of Departments the power to employ any other clerks than those named in the bill, unless specially authorized by Congress hereafter to do so?

Mr. POLAND. I take it they would have no authority unless Congress annually appropriated for them.

Mr. DURHAM. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does not the law, then, provide for the exact number of clerks as specified in section 204, the one he proposes now to change?

Mr. POLAND. In the State Department the act of 1855 provides for twenty-one clerks of all classes.

Mr. DURHAM. We have twenty-seven in this section.

Mr. POLAND. I am not aware there has been any other provision in the permanent statutes, but there have been appropriation bills from year to year which authorize them to have a larger force.

Mr. DURHAM. Why was it that this section was put in here as now unless there was some law authorizing it?

Mr. POLAND. It is taken from an appropriation bill. The commissioners in their report left them out, but Mr. Durant, who had to revise the work of the commissioners, supposed the appropriation bills gave some authority for the appointment, and therefore these lists were put in, as I understand, from more recent appropriation bills.

Mr. SPEER. The effect of it will be to make permanent what the appropriation bills only make temporary.

Mr. POLAND. That would be the effect; but the committee propose to strike all that out. That is just what the committee desire to avoid.

Mr. SPEER. If that is the effect of the amendments proposed by the committee, I certainly hope they will be adopted.

Mr. POLAND. We did not desire to take upon ourselves or to ask this House to take upon itself the responsibility of establishing every man who is now in the public service as a permanent official, holding an office which should continue until Congress should repeal it. It is in that line that the committee proposes to strike out all this list except these higher classes of clerks on whom the law devolves special duties.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. I would like to ask how the head of a Department would make his estimates for clerk hire. I read on page 949, section 3721, beginning on line 8, that the head of a Department in communicating estimates of expenditures and appropriations to Congress—

> Shall also give references to any law or treaty by which the proposed expenditures are respectively authorized, specifying the date of each, and the volume and page of the Statutes at Large, or of the Revised Statutes, as the case may be, and the section of the act in which the authority is to be found.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the head of a Department would do just as he does now in making up his estimates. The head of the Department makes estimates of the number of clerks he thinks the business of his Department requires; and the number that have been culled out from these appropriation acts, from time to time, bears no relation to what the appropriation bills contain year by year. And the whole system of bringing in the enumeration, which was made in a former state of the public business, has passed practically out of use. I suppose if we could look at the estimates—I have not looked at them, this part of the revision not being under my charge—but I suppose we should find that the estimates for the present year, if they go into the subject of clerks at all, go into a statement of what number of clerks will be required in each particular Department, and the Committee on Appropriations in reference to that particular Department make their bills accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to be heard for a minute or two on this subject. I am very reluctant indeed to question for a moment any conclusion that has been reached by this committee on any of these subjects. The act of 1853, fixing the number of clerks to be employed in the Departments, of course came to be practically a nullity in consequence of the events which grew out of the war; so that the practice has been for quite a number of years to simply fix the number of clerks by the various appropriation bills for the several Departments.

I can very fully concur in the views expressed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] with reference to the importance of having some definite statement, so that the number of employés in these various Departments may be fixed and known; and we will then have a list that can be promptly referred back to. For many years we referred back to the legislation of 1853. Now of course that is out of the question. We require to have some other point to begin with. The appropriation bills are laid on our desks from year to year, and the question is always arising, are we increasing or diminishing the number of employés in these Departments? We can have, as on the 1st of last December, the number of clerks authorized by law in these various Departments. It is a matter of really very great importance for our legislation that we should have a starting point to refer back to, so that we might be able to say that on the 1st of December, 1873, the employés in such a Department numbered so and so.

The gentlemen who have charge of this subject must perceive that as a practical matter it is of the utmost importance to have some certain data of this nature. If we were to pass a law this session, like the act of 1853, fixing the number, it would scarcely be worth the time that might be spent upon it. We shall have to depend, after all, on our appropriation bills for this kind of legislation from year to year; and having the data to go upon in this revision as to the number of employés, it would be easy of reference, and we would be able to determine at once whether the employés in these Departments are being increased or diminished.

I co-operated with my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] last winter in trying to find what was the actual number of clerks in the Departments. The Committee on Retrenchment made quite an effort in that direction; and I was struck with the importance of having these matters definitely fixed, or at least that there should be some point of beginning to which you could refer back without embarrassment or difficulty in the examination of bills that come before us for consideration. And I submit that the embarrassment of allowing this portion of the revision to remain just as it is is not great. These few lines occupy but little space in the volume of the statutes, and are valuable as fixing what the law was at the time this revision was fixed upon as taking effect by the action of Congress. I would be as earnest as my friend from Michigan on this point, as I think it of importance to have a fixed list of employés.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. RICE. Considering that the amount of labor in the Departments is constantly varying from necessity, is there any way of fixing the number of laborers to perform that work?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it cannot be done definitely. I do not think you can definitely fix the number of clerks to be always employed. The importance of the matter is to have some data to go upon, upon which a judgment can be formed as to whether the number can be diminished or should be increased from time to time.

Mr. CONGER. I think the importance of this subject warrants me in detaining the House a little longer. I have in my hand a report, No. 88, of the House of Representatives, made during the third session of the Forty-second Congress by the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, of which I had the honor to be chairman. The report refers to the very Department now under consideration. Under direction of the House to inquire what officers and employés, and at what salaries, were employed in the State Department, and whether any were employed without authority of law, our committee required from the State Department a specific statement, "carefully prepared," as we so expressed in our request, of every officer and of every employé over which the State Department had charge; foreign ministers and consuls, as well as the clerks and employés in the Department proper.

In answer to that inquiry we received from the State Department the information embodied in this report, No. 88; information as full and as clear as we desired; information enlightening the committee as it would enlighten members of this House if they had leisure to look over this report; enlightening the committee upon all questions referred to them by the House, and upon all the subjects about which they were instructed to inquire.

Having a report prepared under such auspices and with such particular care by request, I desire to call the attention of the House to this very matter of the clerks, and of the condition of the law existing at this time. This report was made about March 3, 1873. In it are given the dates of the acts providing for the salaries of these clerks, providing for the clerks which the Secretary of State officially informs the committee are in his Department, which are necessary to the Department, whose services cannot be dispensed with, and who are authorized by law.

I desire to say to the House that this statement gives the law from 1853, when there was a revision of the law upon this subject, down to the present time, under which each of these officers and employés receives the salary which he now receives. I ask gentlemen who have this revision before them to follow me while I read from this statement, in their order, the clerks as set down by the Secretary of State their salaries, and the acts providing for them.

The Secretary of State is provided for in the revised law of March 3, 1853, volume 10, page 12, of the Statutes at Large. The Assistant Secretary of State is provided for by the act of March 2, 1865; and the Second Assistant Secretary of State by the act of July 25, 1866. The chief clerk is provided for by the act of March 3, 1855; the disbursing clerk by the act of March 3, 1855; nine clerks of class four, seven by the act of March 3, 1855, and two by the act of March 27, 1870.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Both of them appropriation bills.

Mr. CONGER. I am not speaking now of how they were authorized. They can be authorized by appropriation bills if the point of order is not raised in the House; if it is raised, then they can be provided for by law, as we all know. I am speaking of the law as it stands, whether appropriation bills or otherwise.

I find that the revisers have put down in line 14 of this section "six clerks of class four, of whom one may be appointed disbursing clerk." The Secretary of State returns to the committee of the last Congress a disbursing clerk, and nine clerks of class four, seven authorized by the act of March 3, 1855, the two by another act of 1870. I am not now speaking of whether they are authorized by an appropriation act, or by any other law. This is the report of the present condition of the law,

Then I go on to the next clause of the section. Nine clerks of class three, which corresponds with the statement of the Secretary of State; eight of them authorized in 1855, and one in 1870. Then three clerks of class two, in which the revisers and the Secretary of State agree, two by the act of March, 1855, and one by the act of March, 1857. Then there are eight clerks of class one, the same as in this revision, three authorized in 1855, and five in 1871; different laws and in different years. Then there are one messenger, one assistant messenger, nine laborers, and four watchmen, the same as given by the revisers. The law also provides by the act of March 3, 1871, for extra clerks. And in the last general appropriation act there is appropriated $4,000 for extra clerk hire.

It is only because I find such a specific report referring to the acts and laws as they now stand, giving a different number of clerks from those mentioned in this revision of the code, that I feel at liberty to detain the House by calling the attention of gentlemen to the subject. It also makes upon my mind this impression very strongly that it is important that there should be upon our statute-books, and especially in this revision of the code, of whatever date it may be made, a complete statement of every officer and employé authorized by law. And it is for that reason that I object to striking out the lines in this connection.

If gentlemen please, it is for another reason that I object; that is, that the committee said to us in the commencement that they proposed in this revision to make the law exactly or substantially as it now is, not to strike out anything that exists in the law, and to put in nothing that does not exist. The committee having announced this to be their determination, I think it is varying from that rule to propose to strike out what is in the law, even though it may have been put in the last appropriation act; for that is law.

Now, taking the report which I have here, I could refer to some other officers in reference to whom I have made an examination. Perhaps I shall call attention to that matter at some time hereafter, but I will not now detain the House except upon this one point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By reference to an appropriation act of 1871, I find how these clerks have been provided for by law. I read from that act:

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $8,000; two Assistant Secretaries of State, at $3,500 each; four chief clerks, at $2,200; ten clerks of class four, additional to one clerk of class four as disbursing clerk, nine clerks of class three, three clerks of class two, eight clerks of class one.

That is all the provision there is.

Mr. CONGER. I believe my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has read exactly the law as I read it. I thank him for its repetition in the hearing of the House.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] seems to understand me and to understand the committee as trying to assert that some of these officers have been employed in the Departments without authority of law. The committee do not claim any such thing. What they maintain is that there is no law making these permanent offices; that, although the officers have been employed, and employed legally in the Departments, it has been under mere temporary provisions in appropriation acts. When the head of a Department, by an appropriation act, is authorized to employ a certain officer for that year, and is furnished with money to pay him, the committee do not understand that such a provision establishes the position as a permanent one, so that the official cannot be got rid of, and is entitled to draw his pay, or if Congress does not make an appropriation for him, can bring suit in the Court of Claims to recover the pay.

Now I do not affirm that the Department of State has had any more officers than it needed or any more than it was authorized to have by law. I do not claim that the Secretary of State has exceeded the authority given to him by Congress. But when Congress says, "For this year you may employ five more men and we will furnish you the money to pay them," it does not establish five additional permanent officers in that Department.

The committee propose to leave this matter exactly where it has stood for twenty years, so that each one of these Departments may have the number and classes of clerks that Congress by law each year may authorize, and may provide the money for paying.

The gentleman rightly interprets what has been said by other members of the committee as well as myself. We do not propose to change the existing law; we propose to leave it exactly where it is, so that Congress shall be at full liberty to furnish the Secretary of State, for instance, with as many men for any particular year as the public service may demand. It is upon that very ground and by this very authority of Congress that additional officers have been provided for the State Department and for other Departments. That is precisely the way in which we understand the law to leave the matter, and the way in which we desire to place it in this revision.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. I wish to put to the gentleman still another question. I would like to know how he defines the term "existing law" as it occurs in the rules of this House. I read from the Digest:

It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill which changes the existing law.

An appropriation act is, as urged here, a law, having the same force as any other, and providing a certain number of clerks.

Mr. POLAND. For one year.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. For one year; if an additional number is provided, the question may arise whether there is not a change in the existing law. I do not say that there is; but I ask how that is interpreted.

Mr. POLAND. That has been done in every appropriation bill for any of the Departments ever since I have known anything about appropriation bills. We leave it exactly in that form upon the statutes, Congress having authority to appropriate for just the number of clerks in every Department that it may deem necessary to carry on the public business.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In all the Departments of the Government there are many clerks the sole authority for whose payment rests on appropriation acts. In all the Departments there are also some clerks whose offices, being established either by the organic act or by some subsequent act, are permanent. Clerks exist in the Departments in these two different modes, or by force of these two different classes of laws. We are now endeavoring to incorporate in the revision the general laws of a permanent nature in force on the 1st of December, 1873. If the clerk was in office on the 1st of December, resting solely on the appropriation laws which would expire at the end of the year, he is not in office by virtue of a permanent law, and the law under which he is in office, although it may have been in force on the 1st day of December, ought not to be put into this revision, because it is not a permanent law.

Now, I agree with the gentlemen who have spoken here to-night that there ought to be a general revision of the laws relating to these Departments, and instead of carrying clerks along on appropriation laws, the laws ought to establish the number of all the offices; and this practice of introducing clerks in any appropriation law should be the exception rather than the rule, and the exception ought to be rare. I remember very well, during the rebellion, the office of Judge-Advocate-General was created, but by the terms of the law the office was to expire at the end of the rebellion. The rebellion closed, but the office of Judge-Advocate-General did not close. It was carried on for several years on an annual appropriation bill. I believe within the last two or three years the office has been again made permanent; and undoubtedly in the revision of the laws the office of Judge-Advocate-General would be put down as among the permanent laws, for it is still in force. But these offices, whose tenure continues from year to year and only by force of appropriation laws, do not belong to this revision, and ought not to be inserted in it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to ask a question—whether, practically, there is not entire safety in the fact that Congress virtually regulates from year to year the number of clerks by the amount which is appropriated? You may state the number of clerks so high or so low in your appropriation bills, but you appropriate for a given number of clerks, so there is no danger of more than that number of persons receiving compensation from the Treasury. In that view, inasmuch as there is no danger, the fixing of the number is not desirable; but fixing in this tangible form the exact state of the law as to the number of the employés on the 1st of December ought to be done, as it will furnish data which can be readily reached.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The actual number should be in this revision as it exists by permanent law, for we are collating and revising the general laws of a permanent nature, and not those which continue from year to year, and renewed in the form of appropriations each year. And in presenting the existing permanent law we should incorporate only those permanent in their character, and the appropriation law is not permanent in its character.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. In what is commonly known as the Ku-Klux law the gentleman will remember there was a provision that the President, under certain circumstances, might suspend the writ of habeas corpus, but he should not have the power to do that beyond June or some month in the next year. I ask the gentleman whether he would not put into such a revision such a law as that, although it expires by its own limitation within six months?

Mr. LAWRENCE. That provision of law which would expire ought not to go into this revision.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Not that it has expired, but expires six months ahead.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If it had force on the 1st of December last it would go into the revision.

Mr. POLAND. If it is a temporary law, not yet expired, we should not provide for its repeal.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. What I wish to show by that illustration is this: The appropriation bills are, of course, laws in force on the 1st day of December last. They are laws in force at that time. They are public laws. It is only by virtue of these laws any money can be paid out of the Treasury during the fiscal year. The title, as agreed to last night, is, "An act to revise and consolidate the laws in force on the 1st day of December, 1873." If these appropriation bills are public laws in force on the 1st day of December, why should they not go into this revision?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The law under which this revision was prepared only authorizes the incorporation of laws of a general and permanent nature. These or equivalent words are found in the statute by which this revision is made. Whatever the title of the bill may be, we are only to incorporate laws of a general and permanent nature.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to inquire whether or not the appropriations have not been made for this fiscal year, which ends on the 30th of June next?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. DURHAM. Are not the officers spoken of here provided for by these appropriations?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. DURHAM. Is not that a law existing on the 1st of December last?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly. The law is not a law, however, which says these persons are permanent officials holding office. The Secretary of the Treasury, by appropriation bill, has been authorized to employ this number of persons for the year and provided with the money to pay them. Of course, in preparing our repealing acts we shall take care to see none of these acts are disturbed. Though temporary, and only to last for a year, they should be allowed to run their time out.

Mr. DURHAM. Then you give it as your opinion that there is no general law creating these offices?

Mr. POLAND. It is an employment for the year.

Mr. DURHAM. And your amendment embraces all the offices provided for by the general law?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. DURHAM. Then I go for it.

Mr. POLAND. And it leaves Congress to employ as many or as few of these men next year as they please.

The question being put on the proposed amendments, they were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

Mr. CONGER. I would not to-night ask the vote of the House. I desire, however, to say that I have read distinctly the law which is in existence, and the very item, which is not in an appropriation bill but in a law reorganizing the clerical force. At the proper time I wish to insist that that question shall be voted on by the House. If this passes it beyond recall, I must insist that we shall have a division of the House. The gentlemen in charge of this measure, however, know that I do not wish to cause delay; but if this is to be taken as the action of the House, which cannot be gone over again, I must insist on a vote. I would like to show the House that this is an important point, and that an important provision of existing law is left out; and if the committee, on looking it over, should see that I am correct, I shall propose hereafter to amend it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it understood that the gentleman from Michigan will be at liberty to go back to this section hereafter?

Mr. POLAND. I desire to make a suggestion to my friend from Michigan. I have no desire to have anything put in this that is wrong, especially by so small a representation of the House as we have here. Suppose the House adopted this amendment, would it not be in order for the gentleman to enter a motion to reconsider, so that he could call it up at some future time?

Mr. CONGER. I might not be here.

Mr. POLAND. I am desirous of having the matter left so that you could call it up hereafter.

Mr. CONGER. What possible objection can the committee have to examining the matter to which I have, with some considerable labor, called their attention, giving the references, and, if I am right, making the correction? If I am wrong, I do not insist upon it.

Mr. POLAND. I think the gentleman from Michigan can accomplish all he desires by agreeing that this shall be adopted, and then entering a motion to reconsider; calling it up whenever convenient to himself and the rest of the House. I have seldom known the time when the gentleman was not here.

Mr. CONGER. I am generally around. [Laughter.] I have read from the statute a law reorganizing the clerical force of the State Department, which is not in the appropriation law. That is the existing law; and it is not here.

Mr. POLAND. We desire to get on with our work; and if I understand the practical effect of it, if the gentleman enters a motion to reconsider he can call it up at any future time.

Mr. CONGER. I will take that course; and with the leave of the Chair I now enter a motion to reconsider the last vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would remark that it appears to him that the understanding, which applies to the whole bill, that any member is at liberty to recur to any matter where a mistake is discovered, is applicable to this section and provides also a much more convenient mode of getting at what the gentleman from Michigan desires than his entering a motion to reconsider. Ordinarily a motion to reconsider, when it comes up, takes precedence of all other business; and a motion to reconsider anything done at this special session of the House, brought up so as to interfere with the general business of the House, would raise a very serious question.

Mr. POLAND. I feared that the understanding of the right to go back might be considered as not applying to a case where the House had adopted an amendment. I further understand that this motion to reconsider is only to be brought up when the House has this matter under consideration on some occasion when the House shall happen to be full, or fuller than now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, this section 204 is understood to be included in the right to go back at any future time for purposes of amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I do not think the House would give me the privilege of going back to reconsider the action of the House as a matter merely of courtesy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That right would be given to the gentleman from Michigan by unanimous consent, unless objection be made, to go back to this section at any time.

Mr. CONGER. I would prefer to have the motion to reconsider entered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the gentleman's right; and as he insists upon it the motion to reconsider is entered.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next section to which the committee desire to offer an amendment, is section 211. It is only necessary to read a portion of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 211. The Secretary of State shall lay before Congress:

First. A statement, in a compendious form, of all such changes and modifications in the commercial systems of other nations, whether by treaties, duties on imports and exports, or other regulations, as shall have been communicated to the Department, including all commercial information contained in the official publications of other governments, which he shall deem sufficiently important.

Second, &c.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "shall" in the first line, insert the word "annual."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There is nothing more in this title to which the committee have any amendments to offer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the sixth title.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE 6. The Department of War.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Title 6 brings up exactly the same question which we have been discussing under the previous title. But I will take the opportunity of saying, for the benefit especially of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] that the committee considered seriously and long precisely the question he raised, and upon the grounds upon which he put it, and saw the difficulty of the objection. The committee, as well as the gentleman intrusted with the review of the work, and as the commissioners themselves have done, visited each of the Departments, and got from them these returns which the gentleman has furnished to us from the Department of State; and they found it was impossible to determine what number of clerks there were in existing statutes that would not be considered as repealed or revised and changed by the effect of the appropriation laws. And they came to the conclusion that it is not practicable from any existing law, unless you re-enact the last appropriation bill. And we knew no more reason why we should put into the revised statutes what the last appropriation bill contained in regard to these clerks than we should put in what it contained in reference to the building of the post-office in Boston or the custom-house in Chicago.

Mr. POLAND. Or the appropriation bill of the year before.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Or the appropriation bill of the year before in regard to clerks. We tried our best to get any deduction from existing appropriation acts which it was possible to put into this revision, and failed to do so.

We do not understand this work to be accurate in every particular. We do not think that any two gentlemen that should come together would ever agree what should be put in in this particular. We came to the conclusion, not that we did not find the statutes to which the gentleman refers, for we did, and carefully considered them; we came to the conclusion that the only sensible and possible construction was that Congress had done away with the whole system of these laws, by taking annually the subject of these clerks into its own hands, and making them the subject of annual appropriation.

Now, as one member of the committee, I agree entirely with the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and with the gentleman on my left, [Mr. HOLMAN,] in their view that it is desirable that there should be a specification of what number of clerks is provided for by permanent provisions of law, if there be any such. There are advantages in keeping that constantly before Congress. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] wants to have a point of departure each year, which we all agree would be a good thing, he can have nothing now but the last appropriation bill, because these earlier acts furnish no guide whatever. He must start from the last appropriation bill, to see whether we are rising or falling in expenditure and the amount of public service required. And that he would be able to do just as well if this revision should not pass.

I think, from the remarks that have been made here, that the full force of section 172 has not been perceived by gentlemen. It is provided there by law that such and so many clerks shall be employed, and at such rate of compensation as each annual appropriation bill, from time to time, shall provide.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Always, and with great pleasure.

Mr. CONGER. It is a question in regard to section 172 which I had before designed to ask. I desire to ask whether that section exists separately in any form of law, or whether it is not a conclusion from several statutes and from customs and practices which the committee have thought it would be very wise to embody in one section and in compact form?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It is the result of what the commissioners, and the reviewer of the labors of the commission, and the whole Committee on Revision of the Laws, believe the law now to be.

Mr. CONGER. That is not exactly in answer to my question.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It is not found in these exact terms in any statute whatever. But the object being to bring together in this revision, in a compact form of statement, what the law on this subject is, the committee concluded that that section expressed, it as the commissioners had also concluded. I should not wish to undertake to say in advance that any gentleman, if he tried the experiment, would find that the law could not be otherwise expressed.

Mr. CONGER. I say to the gentleman candidly that I think this section embodies a provision which should heretofore have been in the law, a very wise provision and one very compactly framed. But I am unable to find any single provision of law, and I have looked somewhat carefully to see from what statute this section was taken, or any language, or any section or combination of sections, out of which the committee could take this provision and say that it is a part of the existing law. While I am free to say that it is a provision which will remedy many of the evils of following old appropriation bills, and leave Congress, from time to time, at liberty to make such appropriations as the duties of the Department and judgment of Congress may determine to be required, yet, following the rule which the committee insisted upon so strongly last night, that there should be no invasion upon the present law, I must say that, giving them the credit of having revised handsomely, and made a new section and new provision, still it does not come within the rule of their own definition.

Although this section is a very good one, and one which I hope may become a law here or elsewhere, yet the same liberty which will put together here what ought to be the meaning of a thousand laws or a thousand sections, which would permit the Committee on Revision of the Laws to assume that authority, would give them the authority to so modify the laws of the United States according to their judgment as to entirely change the whole current of them. It is not that I find it here, nor that it is not a good provision—one well worded and which ought to be in force in law; but I am free to say that I think the committee have not followed their own rule in regard to incorporating the existing provisions of law in this revision. I do not think any such provision of law exists in the statute-book, although the meaning of it may be found there.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have already stated that in this respect the committee are subject to criticism because of their misfortune in differing from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] as to what the law is. If we had not come to the conclusion that section 172 expressed the effect and substance of existing law, however much we might have desired it, we should not have given it our sanction. The commissioners came to the conclusion and the committee came to the conclusion that it does express the result of existing law.

And in many cases in this book where statutes conflict, where they are apparently inconsistent, there had to be picked out what finally was found to be the expression of the legislative will. And according to the best understanding of the committee they have here presented to the House what that is. That is all I have to say upon that point.

The next amendment I propose is in title 6, on page 44, section 218, to strike out the words, "The subordinate officers, clerks, and employés of the Department of War, and their respective salaries, shall be as follows;" and to insert in lieu thereof the words, "There shall be in the Department of War;" also to strike out the words, "two clerks, at a salary of $2,000 a year each;" "three clerks of class 4, of whom one may be appointed disbursing clerk;" and to insert the words, "one disbursing clerk."

Mr. CONGER. I must object to that amendment upon the same ground that I before presented.

Mr. POLAND. I hope this amendment will be adopted with the same understanding as before, that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] shall have a right to enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move further to amend by striking out lines 9 to 14, on page 44, as follows:

Six clerks of class three; three clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; one messenger; three assistant messengers; one laborer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose it is understood that I do not assent to these amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore The Chair understands that in regard to all amendments of this class the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] enters a motion to reconsider.

Mr. CONGER. Then these are not treated as passing without objection?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, sir; but as being adopted by a majority vote; and where no record of the vote is made, of course any member may move to reconsider.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move also to amend by striking out lines 17 and 18 as follows:

Four watchmen; two laborers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move further to amend by striking out from lines 21 to 26 as follows:

Six clerks of class four; twelve clerks of class three; fifty-four clerks of class two; forty clerks of class one; two messengers; one assistant messenger.

I do not move to strike out the provision in line 27 for "one fireman." I believe this fireman has a specific duty, and is recognized as a permanent officer of this Department.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. I do not understand why this discrimination is made; why a fireman should be considered a permanent officer.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The committee are not prepared to state that in their opinion he is not such an officer, and therefore they must retain this officer, although the retention may cause an apparent inconsistency. Section 172 does not, by its terms, embrace a "fireman," but it provides for clerks, messengers, laborers, and "other employés." Whether under the latter term there was a specific creation of the office of "fireman" is the question. The revisers do not think there was; and the committee did not feel sure that there was not. Therefore they have let it stand, to the gratification, I have no doubt, of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. "The gentleman from Michigan" is very thankful for small favors, and would be grateful in proportion for larger ones. [Laughter.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If the House is of opinion that this provision for a fireman should be struck out, the committee would make no objection. We desire in dealing with this question to treat it with perfect candor and absolute accuracy, and to embody in this revision, in every case, what we understand to be the law. We have not struck out the superintendent of the building, who had been recognized as a separate officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move further to amend by striking out lines 30 to 36, as follows:

Three clerks of class four; eight clerks of class three; twenty clerks of class two; seventy-five clerks of class one; thirty copyists, at $900 a year each; one messenger; two assistant messengers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out, in line 39, the words "six laborers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move a further amendment, to strike out lines 42 to 46, as follows:

Four clerks of class four; nine clerks of class three; twenty-three clerks of class two; twelve clerks of class one; two messengers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move also to amend by striking out lines 49 and 50, as follows:

Five watchmen; two laborers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move also to amend by striking out lines 53 to 57, as follows:

One clerk of class three; eight clerks of class two; fifteen clerks of class one; one messenger; two laborers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move further to amend by striking out lines 60 and 61, as follows:

Four watchmen; two laborers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I submit also the following amendment:

Strike out lines 64 to 68 as follows:
One clerk of class three; two clerks of class two; eight clerks of class one; one messenger; one laborer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out lines 71 to 76, as follows:

Three clerks of class four; four clerks of class three; four clerks of class two; four clerks of class one; one messenger; one laborer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out lines 79 to 83, as follows:

Three clerks of class four; two clerks of class three; four clerks of class two; six clerks of class one; one messenger.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move further to amend by striking out lines 86 to 91, as follows:

One clerk of class three; one clerk of class one.

In the Signal-Office:
Two clerks of class two.

In the office of Inspector-General:
One clerk of class three.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment the committee have to propose is under "Title 7—The Department of the Treasury." I wish to move an amendment to section 237.

The section was read as follows:

SEC. 237. There shall be in the Department of the Treasury two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall each be entitled to a salary of $6,500 a year, to be paid monthly.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out "500," so as to make the salary $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment is in section 238. I move to strike out the first three lines, as follows:

The subordinate officers, clerks, and employés of the Department of the Treasury, and their respective salaries, shall be as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Lines 8 and 9 now read in this form:

Forty-nine clerks of class four, of whom one may be appointed disbursing clerk.

I move to amend so as to make this paragraph read thus:

There shall be in the Department of the Treasury one disbursing clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out from line 10 to line 17, inclusive, on the next page.

The Clerk read as follows:

Thirty clerks of class three; twenty-six clerks of class two; twenty-seven clerks of class one; thirty-two women clerks, at a salary of $900 a year each; eleven messengers; one assistant messenger; ten laborers.

Mr. CONGER. I move to except lines 13 and 14, "thirty-two women clerks, at a salary of $900 a year each." And I make that motion because there is, according to my recollection, a distinct law regulating that class of employés which was enacted after a pretty full discussion in this House.

Mr. POLAND. How many?

Mr. CONGER. Thirty-two was the number provided in the express law. There is another provision of law, as I remember, that a certain number may be employed.

Mr. POLAND. I am not aware there is any difference in the law in reference to male clerks and female clerks. There is a provision of law which authorizes the employment of females in the Departments; but I take it there is the same general question applying to one class as to the other.

Mr. CONGER. My recollection is very distinct that in the Forty-first Congress this provision was insisted on. There was a provision which it was supposed absolutely provided for the appointment of these clerks and fixed their salary. That provision of law is distinct from an appropriation bill fixing a higher salary and the grade of salary for these clerks.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I refer the gentleman to section 168:

SEC. 168. Women may, in the discretion of the head of any Department, be appointed to any of the clerkships therein, authorized by law, upon the same requisites and conditions, and with the same compensation, as are prescribed for men.

Mr. CONGER. That embodies a provision that they may be employed. There is an express provision in regard to their salary. Last Congress there was another provision of law, which I do not find incorporated here, that women employed as clerks in the Departments might receive $1,400.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That is in section 168.

Mr. POLAND. I will suggest to my friend from Michigan that this will all be embraced under his motion to reconsider, and will be brought up with all the rest.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The offices of every grade are open to women. In another clause he will find provision for their compensation when employed for temporary purposes.

Mr. CONGER. If this bill could be passed within a month, and should be passed as proposed here, there will be no law existing for the employment of clerks whose classes are stricken out here. The appropriation bills under which it is said appropriations last from the first of July to the last of June next would be abrogated, and we would be entirely afloat. Gentlemen are amending it and insisting on going on rapidly, in the hope of getting through some time. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House, but I cannot feel satisfied that this committee in striking out a known provision of law is carrying out their duty, or going in the direction they proposed when we commenced. A change as radical as this, leaving whole Departments with these few remaining officers, with no law to define who shall be appointed, and of what class, leaving them to appropriation bills, or other new law to do it, seems to me a wild proceeding. But I have at least endeavored to do my duty in calling the attention of the House to it, and I will wait for a full House, when I can be heard on the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on a vote on his amendment?

Mr. CONGER. I should like the Chair to put the question, and without a division of the House he can say the amendment is lost.

Mr. POLAND. I apprehend the gentleman's motion to reconsider this whole matter, when brought up, will bring up this with all the rest. The committee does not desire to entrap anybody in this matter.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. E. R. HOAR'S amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sixty watchmen, of whom two shall be appointed lieutenants of watchmen, and shall be entitled to an additional salary of $220 a year each.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out the words "sixty watchmen, of whom."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I propose to amend also by striking out, in the same line, the words "shall be appointed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the committee wish the House to understand that the errata printed here are part of the bill?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair observes that among the errata there is an amendment in the twenty-second line.

Mr. E. H. HOAR. Yes, sir. I offer the following amendment:

On page 50, line 22, strike out "four" and insert "six," so it will read:
One engineer, at a salary of $1,600 a year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I offer the following amendment:

On page 50, line 34, strike out "six," and insert "seven," and after the word "hundred," insert "twenty," so it will read:
Nine firemen, at a salary of $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I offer the following amendment:

On page 50, line 31, strike out the words, "and shall be entitled to," and insert in their place the word "with."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair would announce that the amendment is agreed to, instead of saying that there is no objection, I would prefer it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan would be entitled to move a reconsideration, even if the amendment were adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. POLAND. There will be an understanding that on each one of these amendments the gentleman is entitled to make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBBINS. In line 31 there is mention made of "an additional salary." This seems to make the salary indefinite.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It means additional to what other watchmen receive. That is the meaning. Perhaps the language is open to criticism. The provision intended to be incorporated, which we found in the law, was that the lieutenants of the watch should have a salary additional to that of other watchmen. I move, besides the amendments already made in that section, to strike out the words "an additional" and insert in their place the word "a;" so that it will read, instead of "an additional salary," "a salary;" and to add at the end of line 32 the words "in addition to the compensation allowed other watchmen."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts will send his amendment in writing to the Chair.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 30, 31, and 32, as follows:
Sixty watchmen, of whom two shall be appointed lieutenants of watchmen, and shall be entitled to an additional salary of $280 a year.
And substitute these words:
Two lieutenants of watchmen, with a salary of $280 each in addition to the compensation allowed other watchmen.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. Inasmuch as these salaries have been changed, it seems to me that it would be better to strike out everything relating to the salaries of these officers. I notice that in the provision for the disbursing clerk and other officers nothing has been said in this statute about their salaries. If this is left here it might mislead the officers who make the estimates hereafter. It seems to me that it would be much better to strike it out. I make that motion, to strike out the words "with a salary of $280 each in addition to the compensation allowed other watchmen."

Mr. RICE. That is the law, as I understand it. This gives a lieutenant $280 more than a private.

Mr. CONGER. And, as we have declared by a former amendment that there shall be no private, this makes the compensation of the lieutenant as here fixed $280 a year.

Mr. RICE. It provides that the superior officer shall receive more money than a private, whenever he is appointed. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. The reason I offer my amendment is this: that in raising the salaries of these officers by the law passed in the last Congress they were raised pro rata, as I supposed, by a certain percentage. They have been reduced since then, and I see no reason why the increase of the compensation of these two particular officers over those associated with them should be left in this general statute, while the salaries of many of the subordinate officers mentioned here are not fixed at all.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is this provision which he proposes to strike out a part of existing law? I understand our purpose here to be to declare what the law is, as it is, and not to make it what we would like to have it to be; so that, if this be part of that law, we have no business to strike it out; if it is not part of that law, it has no business here.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. And we are striking out part of existing laws, and have been so doing.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is not what I have understood.

The amendment of Mr. E. R. HOAR was to amend lines 30, 31, and 32, so as to read, "two lieutenants of watchmen, with a salary of $280 a year each, in addition to the compensation allowed to other watchmen."

The amendment of Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, was to strike out of the proposed amendment all that portion prescribing the salary of the two lieutenants of watchmen.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move further to strike out in line 33 the words "thirty laborers;" and all of lines 37, 38, and 39, being as follows:

And so many subordinate officers, clerks, and employés as may be from time to time authorized by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. How much longer does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire the faithful to remain here?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have no desire at all.

Mr. POLAND. Let us get through with this chapter; we can get through with it very soon.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If there is no discussion on it, we can finish this chapter in five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to be considered as desiring to interfere with this work; but it is now ten o'clock.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I send to the Clerk's desk the remainder of the amendments which the committee proposes to this section.

The amendments were to make the remainder of the section read as follows:

In the office of the Second Comptroller:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

In the office of the First Auditor:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

In the office of the Second Auditor:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year; one disbursing clerk.

In the office of the Third Auditor:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year; one disbursing clerk.

In the office of the Fourth Auditor:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

In the office of the Fifth Auditor:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

In the office of the Sixth Auditor:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year; one disbursing clerk.

Also in the money-order division:
Fifteen assorters of money-orders, at a salary of $900 a year each.

In the office of the Treasurer of the United States:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year; one cashier, at a salary of $2,800 a year; one assistant cashier, at a salary of $2,500 a year; five chiefs of divisions, at a salary of $2,200 a year each; two principal book-keepers, at a salary of $2,200 a year each; two tellers, at a salary of $2,200 a year each; two assistant tellers, at a salary of $2,000 a year each; seven women, as laborers, at a salary of $240 a year each.

In the office of the Register:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

In the office of the Commissioner of Customs:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

In the office of the Light-House Board:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

In the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be employed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury:
Two deputy commissioners, at a salary of $3,000 a year each; seven heads of divisions, at a salary of $2,500 a year each.

In the office of the Comptroller of the Currency:
Two night-watchmen, at a salary of $900 a year each.

In the Construction Branch of the Treasury:
One supervising architect, at a salary of $5,000 a year; one assistant supervising architect, at a salary of $2,500 a year; one chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year; one photographer, at a salary of $2,500 a year; two assistant photographers, one at a salary of $1,600 a year, and one at a salary of $1,200 a year.

In the Bureau of Statistics:
One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year; one charwoman, at a salary of $480 a year.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. On page 50, lines 34, 35, and 36, are as follows:

Nine firemen, at a salary of $600 a year each; ninety charwomen, at a salary of $180 a year each.

I can see no reason myself why this should not be stricken out with all the others. The only law that provides for their employment is in an appropriation bill. Why should we solemnly enact as the permanent law of the United States that there shall be ninety charwomen and nine firemen employed in this Department? The law provides what a fireman shall be, but it does not provide how many there shall be. The right to employ both these classes of persons is embraced in a general provision of law.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. Why does the gentleman regard the salary of any of these officers more permanent than the provision made for any of the others? Is not the salary of all of them provided by the appropriation bills?

Mr. POLAND. In regard to all the classes of clerks there is a general law providing for them.

The amendment of Mr. POLAND was agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call the attention of my colleague [Mr. POLAND] to the fact that on page 45, line 27, in relation to the Department of War, are left the words "one fireman." I think those words also should be stricken out.

Mr. POLAND. I think so myself, and I move that amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the members of the Committee on Revision of the Laws would agree upon that point. One of them stated awhile ago that those words should be left to gratify me. [Laughter.] And now another member of the committee moves to strike them out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would call attention to lines 202 and 203, in connection with the page of errata, which indicates that the words "at a salary of $900 a year each" should be stricken out after the words "two night-watchmen."

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There are other errata in relation to this section, but I think they are obviated by the amendments which have been adopted.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There are no further amendments to be proposed to this chapter. Therefore I hope that it may be adopted before we adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be so considered if there be no objections.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

The motion of Mr. DURHAM was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: The petition of Alexander Moseley and others, tanners and manufacturers of leather in Massachusetts, asking that extracts for tanning purposes may be placed on the free list, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of John Brady, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

Also, the petition of William C. Shimoneck, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLYMER: The petition of citizens of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, relative to the currency, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, the petition of citizens of Reading, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduces the duties on certain manufactured goods, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COBB, of Kansas: The petition of Emma C. Horn and others, heirs of William M. Chenoult, deceased, for remuneration for property taken by the United States, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Ralph King, to be compensated for extra services rendered while consul of the United States in the republic of Bremen, from 1849 to 1853, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of William M. Coffey, guardian of the minor children of Benjamin F. McGuire, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut: The petition of William R. Glover and Thomas W. Mather, for the restoration of their case against the United States to the docket of the Court of Claims, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of William G. Cazenove and others, merchants of Alexandria, Virginia, asking consideration of draught of a bill to incorporate a national exchequer, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, the petition of George W. Hanchett and others, soldiers of the Mexican war, for pensions and bounty, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. LYNCH: The petition of citizens of Port Gibson, Mississippi, for payment of the claim of the Southern Methodist publishing house at Nashville, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MARTIN: The petition of Henry H. Kaiser, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of Margaret Ward, for compensation for depredations by the Comanche Indians, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, the petition of graduates of the United States Naval Academy of the class of June 4, 1869, for rank and precedence as determined by the date of their graduation, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of Churchill & Beecher and others, druggists, of Oberlin, Ohio, for the repeal of the stamp tax on medicines, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Isaac Jeanes & Co. and others, of Philadelphia, importers of perishable fruits, for their admission free of duty, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NEGLEY: The petition of Captain Frank A. M. Kreps, for arrears of pay, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of Robert Wilson, of Baltimore, Maryland, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Resolutions of the Philadelphia County Medical Society, in regard to a portion of the sixth section of the Army appropriation act of March 3, 1869, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of certain citizens of Philadelphia, for the conversion of United States notes into bonds of $1,000 and its multiple, payable on demand in legal-tender notes, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. PARSONS: The petition of Patrick H. Breslin, praying an investigation of the cause of his summary dismissal from the Army, with a view to restoration, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The memorial of Seth Driggs, a claimant under the treaty of the 25th of April, 1866, between the United States and the republic of Venezuela, for relief, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the petition of James Fleming, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of the Corn Exchange, Tobacco Exchange, and Chamber of Commerce of Richmond, Virginia, of members of the Legislature, and of other citizens of Virginia, for the improvement of the Mattapony River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: The petition of certain citizens of Richmond, Virginia, for the payment of the claim of the Southern Methodist publishing house at Nashville, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of certain citizens of Iowa for an appropriation for the benefit of certain Pottawatomie Indians residing in that State, to the Committee on Appropriations.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 23, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution of the Senate of March 11, 1873, in regard to the conveniences furnished and space allotted to steerage immigrants on board ship; which was referred to the Committee on Printing to inquire into the propriety of printing it.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the petition of Andrew & Tredway and 593 others, citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, praying for such legislation as will open the Clinton bridge to the use of all railroads seeking to cross it. The object of this petition, I will state briefly, is to allow such railroads as may be completed at the city of Clinton, or opposite to that city on the east bank of the Mississippi River, to cross a bridge there which is now exclusively crossed by a single railway. This petition represents all the best business men in the city of Dubuque.

I also present the petition of C. H. Barron & Co., and 89 other citizens of McGregor, Iowa, to the same effect; also, the petition of G. Kennett & Brother and 274 other citizens of Lansing, Iowa, to the same effect; also, the petition of Fleck & Brother and 11 other business men of Guttenberg, Iowa, to the same effect; also, the petition of William A. Warren and 189 other citizens of Bellevue, Iowa, to the same effect; also, the petition of O. H. Maryatt and 88 other citizens of New Albin, Iowa, to the same effect; also, the petition of T. McMichael and 74 other citizens of Brownsville, Minnesota, to the same effect; also, the petition of Milo Smith and 177 other citizens of Clinton, Iowa, to the same effect; and also the petition of Jacob Shoemaker and 213 citizens of Harper's Ferry, Iowa, asking for the same legislation. These petitions represent the business interests on the Mississippi River, extending for a distance of one hundred and fifty miles north of Clinton. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I trust that that committee will give them such early consideration as the business before it will allow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, calling attention to the demoralizing system of rewarding informers by moieties, with arbitrary powers vested in them, enabling them to seize books and papers and the like. I move the reference of these resolutions in the nature of a memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I also present the petition of the Nostrand Avenue Methodist Episcopal church, of Brooklyn, New York; the petition of Daniel M. Treadwell, and other citizens of Brooklyn, New York; the petition of the Washington Avenue Baptist church, of Brooklyn, New York; and the petitions of different lodges of the Sons of Temperance of Troy, New York, all asking that a commission be appointed to investigate the evils of the traffic in alcoholic drinks. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Finance, which I believe is the favored committee in that respect.

Mr. SCOTT. They have reported on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that a bill has been reported on that subject, and therefore the petitions will lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the petition of members of the bar of Camden, Oneida County, in the State of New York, praying this body to pass a law repealing absolutely the bankrupt act; also the petition of residents of the county of Madison, in the State of New York, very numerously signed, asking the absolute repeal of the bankrupt law; also a petition from the city of Madison, in the State of New York, asking the unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law. I move that these petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the resolutions of the National Board of Trade adopted on the 16th of January, 1874, expressing the judgment of the board that the award made at Geneva for losses sustained by the Alabama and other vessels of like character, should be shared by underwriters in the same manner and upon the same terms as individuals. I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a petition numerously signed by American women setting forth their understanding of the spirit and intendments of the more recent constitutional amendments, and praying Congress to pass a declaratory act to guarantee the exercise of the elective franchise to women in all the States and Territories of the Union. I do not know whether a bill is pending on this subject before any committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not; but similar petitions have been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I move that this petition be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a petition as to its intention, although it is not addressed to Congress that I can discover, signed by a number of women, and expressing the wish that right, intelligence, and other things shall prevail. This petition refers to two or three distinguished members of this body, treating them as references, and some distinguished members of the House. I present the paper as it has been forwarded to me, although I believe within the rule, not being addressed to the Senate, it cannot be considered technically as a petition or memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be received if there be no objection, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SCOTT presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Scranton, Pennsylvania, in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. M. B. McCulloch, praying a reconsideration of her claim for a pension, which at the third session of the Forty-second Congress was reported on adversely by the Committee on Pensions, and setting forth additional evidence in the case; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of the Board of Trade of Mobile, Alabama, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the bars in Mobile Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I have had forwarded to me resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, in reference to the celebration of the centennial anniversary of American Independence. They are the same resolutions that have been presented already by my colleague and read to the Senate. I therefore move that they be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORWOOD presented a petition of citizens of Augusta, Georgia, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NORWOOD. I also present a petition of druggists of Savannah, Georgia, which, though not addressed to the Senate, is intended for it, praying that stamp duties on medicines be removed. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present a petition, which may have been presented heretofore, from certain persons in the naval service, complaining that injustice has been done them as graduates of the class of June 4, 1869. I present this petition, though it may have been presented heretofore, for the reason that it has been sent to me by a very intelligent gentleman of my State, who states that very great injustice has been done to these persons. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT also presented the petition of Mary Randolph, of Iowa, praying for the enactment of a law extending the time for applying for pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of the Cottage Street Congregational church, of Boston, Massachusetts, and a petition of citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, asking for the appointment of a commission to investigate the liquor traffic. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest that there has been a report on that subject, and perhaps the petitions may as well lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. If that is so, they can lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will lie on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been requested to present a petition, signed, as I am assured, by some of the most respectable and wealthy citizens of the District of Columbia, containing a number of very grave charges against the government of this District, which I will not take up the time of the Senate to state, except in a general way to say that they are charges of very serious maladministration of the affairs of this District, and ending with a prayer—the petition being addressed to Congress—

That a joint select committee may be appointed, with full power and authority to examine into the manner in which the affairs of said government of the District of Columbia have been managed in each and all of its departments, and especially in that of the Board of Public Works, since its organization, and that your petitioners and other citizens of said District may be allowed to be present at the sessions of said committee and to be represented by counsel.

I do not propose at this time to offer any resolution for the appointment of such a committee. I am told that evidence in support of the allegations in this petition will be presented in due time, and then it will be proper to offer a resolution for the appointment of a committee, if that evidence shall in anywise tend to sustain these allegations. I think this petition ought to be printed, so that the people of the District may see what it is; and I ask that it be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. CONKLING. It will be printed in the newspapers, no doubt. I have no more objection to this petition being printed than others; but the chairman of the Committee on Printing, not now here, the other day, when I presented a petition special in its character which I thought ought to be printed, reminded us that we ought not to enter upon that course of business—that we could not discriminate. This petition will be printed of course in all the papers of this city; and inasmuch as this District is now but about seven miles square, there is far less reason in that regard for printing this petition than there is for printing a petition which is interesting to the whole country. Therefore, while I do not wish at all to diminish the effect of the petition or the presentation of it, I do not think it worth while to print it and lay it on our tables.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not at all tenacious about the printing of this petition, although I do think that, considering the gravity of the charges that are made—whether there is foundation for them or not I express no opinion whatsoever—and the number of persons interested in the petition, it is but fair that it should be printed. However, if the Senator thinks that it certainly will be printed in the newspapers, I do not know that I care about it one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; let it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid on the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should be very glad to have the petition printed. I know nothing about it. One thing is certain: very grave charges have been preferred against the management of the affairs of this District. We are called upon annually to vote large sums of money to pay for work done by this Board of Public Works. It is, therefore, a question on which we ought to have information. Now, in reference to the printing of this petition by the papers of the District, that may or may not be the case. At any rate, it will not cost a great deal of money to have it printed and laid on our tables, so that if we investigate the charges we may see what the charges are and have our attention called to the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware make that motion?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the petition be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. That motion must go to the Committee on Printing, under the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we ought to print these charges until the Senator who presents them says they are supported by testimony. My colleague has said that in due time testimony will be presented in support of these charges, and then it will be sufficiently early to publish the charges to the world. Indeed, I do not think we ought to give them currency any further than by the ordinary course of presenting petitions until after they are supported by some testimony. I do not know the nature of them, as a matter of course; but they should not be printed until they are made in due form and supported by testimony, so that we may examine them and the evidence that may be adduced in support of them. Until testimony is presented to us, with the statement that that testimony tends to support the charges, they ought not to be published.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suppose it will not take a great deal of time to have the petition read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Delaware that under the rule the motion to print the petition must be referred to the Committee on Printing. By unanimous consent the Senate could order it to be printed this morning, but otherwise under the rule the question of printing will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to have the petition read, so that I may know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks for the reading of the petition. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is contrary to the rule, and I do not think we ought to violate the rule. The rule says that the Senator presenting a petition shall state its substance. We cannot read all the petitions that are presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects to its reading.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the regular order.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of U. L. Jones be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Carter be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, to report it with two amendments. I should like to have the bill read, and if Senators then object to it or want further information, as a matter of course it can be explained or can go over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, there is no use in proceeding to consider any bills until we get through with the morning business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I found it totally impossible yesterday to introduce a bill, for the reason that we took up everything when it was presented. I shall have no objection, after we go through with the morning business strictly, to take up anything that anybody wants to have taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1382) authorizing coinage to be executed at the mints of the United States for foreign countries, to report it without amendment. I would ask the present consideration of it, but let it lie over until after the morning business is through.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Matthew Woodruff, late of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteer Infantry, praying for an honorable discharge from the Army and to be allowed back pay and bounty, reported a bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Oliver Powers, praying to be allowed pay as a private in Company K, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, up to the day that the company was discharged, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 366) for the relief of Oliver Powers. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 336) to appoint a commission on the subject of the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic, to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The committee reported a bill yesterday on the same general subject, and therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this bill.

The committee was discharged.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1231) to abolish the office of deputy commissioner of internal revenue, have instructed me to report it back, and to ask immediate action; but I will withhold it for the present, for the reason that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] says he will object to the present consideration of such bills, and I shall ask the Senate to take it up, if possible, before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel C. Taylor and others, praying that a certain piece of ordnance formerly belonging to Battery B, First Rhode Island Light Artillery, understood to be now in the possession of the United States Government, may be delivered to them for preservation, to be placed in the custody of the State of Rhode Island, reported a bill (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that will be put on its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; you cannot put anything on its passage out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. NORWOOD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Barbara A. Nock, mother of William H. Nock, deceased, late private in Company D, Seventy-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, praying for arrears of pension, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from its further consideration.

ENTRIES ON FORT KEARNEY RESERVATION, IOWA.

Mr. TIPTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 241) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation in Fremont County, Iowa, to report it back without amendment. I should like to have the bill put on its passage now, inasmuch as the parties entitled to these lands have been seventeen years lying out of their money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none; and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The preamble recites certain entries at the Council Bluffs land district, in the State of Iowa, on lands which had been reserved for military purposes for the use of Fort Kearney, by order of the President of the United States, dated the 9th of April, 1846, and therefore illegal; and that the Secretary of War, by letter under date of the 11th of March, 1870, advised the Secretary of the Interior "that the United States military reservation at Fort Kearney, on the Missouri River, is no longer required for military purposes;" and that the register and the receiver at Council Bluffs have reported, under date of May 23, 1870, to the General Land Office, that due notice having been given to all persons having any interest in the same to appear before them on the 18th day of May, 1870, and show cause why the entries named should not be confirmed by act of Congress, no adverse claimants appeared before them. The bill therefore proposes to confirm the entries and selections described in the preamble; and to authorize patents to issue for the same as in other cases provided for by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is there any report with this bill?

Mr. TIPTON. Yes, sir; a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand this is to confirm in individuals a part of a military reservation. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, seventeen years ago these lands were entered and paid for; two or three years ago the Secretary of War notified the Secretary of the Interior that these lands were no longer regarded as any part of a military reservation, and this is simply to confirm the title. It has passed the Senate twice over in two different sessions of Congress, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office again the third time sends a letter here, in which he says it is all right. These lands are in Iowa, opposite Nebraska City. Fort Kearney has not been at that place for twenty years, nor has there been any military occupation of the land for twenty years. There is no adverse title.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask if there are existing improvements made by the Government of the United States upon these lands?

Mr. TIPTON. No improvement ever was made by the Government upon the land at all.

Mr. HOWE. How much is the tract?

Mr. TIPTON. It covers half a dozen farms or more.

Mr. HOWE. All that is provided for by this bill?

Mr. TIPTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Half a dozen farms of what size?

Mr. TIPTON. One hundred and sixty acres each, I presume. Old Fort Kearney was originally in Nebraska, and a portion of land opposite, in Iowa, was held out to be a part of the reservation belonging to it. Old Fort Kearney was more than twenty years ago carried two hundred miles west. These lands were never occupied by the United States Government. There was an old block-house once on the Missouri River opposite, though, called Old Fort Kearney; but in the last twenty years Fort Kearney has been removed two hundred miles west. Citizens of Iowa entered these lands and paid for them seventeen years ago; but, as the tract was nominally a military reservation at that time, the titles were not confirmed to them. Two years ago the Secretary of War recommended that the titles be confirmed to these people, and twice over we have passed bills for the purpose, that failed to get through the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWE. How many parties entered these lands?

Mr. TIPTON. Half a dozen or more; and in every case the receipt and the number of it for the money paid by them and the entry made are recorded in the bill from the General Land Office.

Mr. SARGENT. How many acres are involved in it?

Mr. TIPTON. I do not know how many.

Mr. SARGENT. About how many?

Mr. TIPTON. It may be a thousand acres or so. No adverse claims ever have been made for these lands in seventeen years.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to ask whether the money has ever been refunded by the Government to the parties who made these entries?

Mr. TIPTON. Never refunded; and every certificate mentioned in the bill, or receipt for money stated there, is identified by the General Land Office record.

Mr. HOWE. And the money is still in the Treasury?

Mr. TIPTON. Still in the Treasury.

Mr. PRATT. And the purchasers on the land?

Mr. TIPTON. The purchasers have always been on the land for seventeen years.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator was not distinctly understood by those around me, whether he said eighty thousand or one thousand acres.

Mr. TIPTON. One thousand acres or more.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to hear the letter of the Secretary of War read if it is among the papers.

Mr. TIPTON. There is a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be read.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The letter of the Secretary of War stating that Fort Kearney is not necessary as a military reservation is what I want to hear.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill passed the House of Representatives once, and passed the Senate twice. I send to the desk a document printed by the House of Representatives in the Forty-first Congress, which explains the whole matter, and it can be read if Senators desire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill ought to go over to let us look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no letter from the Secretary of War, but there are papers from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But this bill recites that there is a letter from the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOWE. I put some questions to the Senator from Nebraska; and unless his answers are entirely incorrect, it does seem to me that there ought to be no objection to the passage of this bill. The lands were entered and paid for, as the Senator says, seventeen years ago. The Government has held on to the money ever since, and certainly ought to give the land or return the money. As the claimants do not seem to stand any chance of getting the money, I think they ought to have the land.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no possible objection to the passage of this bill at this time. This land was paid for seventeen years ago; twice advertisements were issued for adverse claimants. The Commissioner of the General Land Office recommends that the title be confirmed at this time, and has recommended it on two several occasions before. There are no adverse claimants. The Senate passed the bill at the last session, and it failed for want of time in the House.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The only point I want information upon is this: Here is a military reservation, and I want some assurance that this subject has been brought to the attention of the Secretary of War; and I ask to have his letter read, which, I understood from the reading of the bill, was referred to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On examination it is not found among the papers.

Mr. TIPTON. The letter of the Secretary of War was the first source of action in this case by the Secretary of the Interior; and there is a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office of this date, and one, I believe, from the Secretary of the Interior also, that covers the whole case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear them read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letters will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1872.

SIR: In compliance with your request, made in person this morning, I have the honor to state that there appear to be no adverse claims to the lands described in H. R. bill No. 2196, which lands were embraced within the late Fort Kearney reservation.

These tracts were entered many years ago by the parties named in the bill, and being within said reservation they were illegal. There are very many persons who have an interest therein, which has been derived from or under conveyances extending back to the original purchasers.

The War Department has relinquished all claim to said lands, and the report of the register and receiver at Council Bluffs, Iowa, shows that an investigation was duly had, and that there were no adverse claimants to any of said lands.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. P. W. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1874.

SIR: The letter written by direction of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, on the 9th instant, transmitting for my examination Senate bill No. 241, "to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation in Fremont County, Iowa," and asking my opinion as to the propriety of passing it, was referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of his report on the subject, and to state that I concur in the views therein set forth.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO,
Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, U. S. Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1874.

SIR: I had the honor to receive on the 10th instant, by reference from the Department, the letter herewith returned, addressed to the Secretary, under date of the 9th instant, by Amos Pickard, esq., clerk of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, by direction of that committee, inclosing for examination Senate bill No. 241, "to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation in Fremont County, Iowa," and asking his opinion as to the propriety of passing the same.

It having been referred to me for report, I have to state that I find this to be the same which, as H. R. bill No. 2196, was the subject of my letter to the Hon. P. W. HITCHCOCK, of the Senate, dated the 15th of May, 1872, a copy of which I inclose herewith; and in view of the facts therein stated I am of opinion that the bill should be passed.

I note what is probably a typographical error in the printed bill inclosed, in giving, in the third line of the second page, the name Allen A. Brodford. This should be Allen A. Bradford, the name of the party, as shown by the certificate of purchase in the case, which is on file in this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. THURMAN. I should be glad if one of the Senators who have this bill in charge would state whether the persons whose claim it is proposed shall be confirmed are settlers on this land; and if so, how long they have been settlers.

Mr. TIPTON. These lands are to be confirmed, first, to John Boulware, who entered, per cash certificate numbered 1256, dated January 2, 1864; second, "the northwest quarter of southeast quarter of section 30, township 68 north, range 43 west, by William C. Fowlkes, per cash certificate numbered 2690, dated June 1, 1854," and so on. So that the Land Office in every case gives the name of the person who purchased, the number of the receipt, and the amount of the money that he paid, and everything specifically according to the records of the General Land Office; and this bill is to confirm the title to the original purchasers, payers, and holders.

Mr. THURMAN. But my question is whether the persons who made those entries, or anybody claiming under them, have been in possession and have improved those lands.

Mr. TIPTON. They have improved them, and they are as highly cultivated as any other lands in the State of Iowa; they have cultivated them for seventeen years.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 368) to provide for the establishment of an international commission of the maritime powers to lay down ocean courses for steam-vessels, and otherwise provide for increased safety of sea-travel; which was read twice by its title, referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 369) to change the name of the registered steamer Oakes Ames to Champlain; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 370) donating certain condemned cannon for a soldiers' monument at Winterport, Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill, (S. No. 371) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY, by request, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 372) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 87) to facilitate the execution of, and to protect, certain public works in the improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 373) to provide for the national defense, to afford cheap transportation by water from the interior to the Atlantic sea-board, by way of the great lakes of the Northwest, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to introduce a bill and to ask to say one word upon it. I accept the law that the franking privilege is abolished. There is great inconvenience arising from the inability to send documents which are printed and those which are constantly being printed to persons who wish them, and to public institutions, such as colleges and State libraries. I therefore ask leave to introduce a bill dispensing with the prepayment of postage in these cases and reducing the postage to twenty-five cents a volume, and providing that if the books are not called for within ten days they may be sold to pay the postage. I have had frequent applications for books and public documents. One gentleman from the State of New York wrote to me for five volumes, and said it afforded him great pleasure to inclose fifty cents for the postage, because the franking privilege had been abolished. I got the five volumes and found that the postage on one volume was forty-six cents. I sent him the volume with stamps making up the other four cents, and left him rejoicing. This reduces the postage to about one-half.

I ask that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 374) to facilitate the distribution of public documents; and it was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 375) for the benefit of the Kentucky Agricultural and Mechanical Association; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the bill, together with the memorial and accompanying papers now on the files of the Senate in that case, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTABLISHMENT OF POST-OFFICES.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas the Constitution confers upon Congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, the power being in each case the same; and whereas Congress at an early day delegated to the Postmaster-General the power to establish and discontinue post-offices at his discretion, and without requiring any consent of Congress to be given in advance of their establishment, or subsequently: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire whether a just construction of the Constitution does not require that such post-offices should either be established by Congress, or that its consent be given after they have been established by the Postmaster-General.

RHODE ISLAND BATTERY GUN.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I ask that the bill which was reported just now, giving a gun to the archives of Rhode Island, be considered.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, to the proper authorities of the State of Rhode Island, a certain gun marked "Battery B, First Regiment, Rhode Island Light Artillery, battle of Gettysburgh," for the purpose of being placed among the archives of that State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, which was reported this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; I object; and I do so in order that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Commerce. That subject has been before that committee for several years, and provisions in regard to that canal have been included in several bills. I believe the bill involves the expenditure of a million or two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan objects to the present consideration of the bill, and it goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has it not been taken up by a motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not taken up; it was simply read for information, subject to objection.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that the bill (S. No. 87) to facilitate the execution of and to protect certain public works and improvements at the mouth of the Mississippi River be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Commerce report sundry amendments, which, if adopted, would make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War is directed to assume full control over the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States; he may establish such regulations respecting the use of, or passage through, such channel as he shall deem needful to fully protect the channel and to facilitate the excavation, improvement, and use thereof. Such regulations shall be promulgated by publication thereof for ten days consecutively in two daily papers published in New Orleans, Louisiana, and the same may in like manner be changed from time to time.

SEC. 2. That if any person shall violate any such regulations, he shall, on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not more than six months, or by both such punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think that bill had better go over.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope the Senator from Delaware will withdraw his objection. The bill will be explained.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SPENCER. It was reported yesterday, and can be taken up to-day on motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposed the bill had been reported this morning. The motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill is in order. The Chair will submit the motion to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to have the bill and the amendments read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. DAVIS. While the Clerk is hunting up the amendments, I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana whether he has examined the bill, and whether it covers the ground talked over by the committee and himself when he was before them.

Mr. WEST. I reply to the Senator's question, by stating that the bill, as he will see by examining the printed copy which he has on his desk, was introduced by myself, that I have been before the Committee on Commerce; attended also by the chairman of the Committee on Transportation, and such amendments as we recommended have been unanimously adopted and reported in favor of by the Committee on Commerce. It meets exactly the abuses proposed to be corrected, as the Senator very well knows from the examination that was had when the Committee on Transportation visited that section recently.

I do not think it worth while to detain the Senate with the reasons for the passage of the bill. I do not think anybody will raise a voice against it.

Mr. DAVIS. I join with the Senator from Louisiana in believing that it is proper that some such bill should be passed, but I should like to know from the Senator from Louisiana if it is the tug-boat system that is intended to be remedied.

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir; that is it. It strikes at the tug-boat monopoly there, which is such an oppression on commerce, as the Senator very well knows.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no doubt that some bill on this subject ought to be passed, and that the monopoly which now exists there ought to be remedied, and it appears to me that Congress is the only power which can apply a remedy.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this bill strikes a lawyer as rather a singular production. It provides that the Secretary of War shall "assume full control over the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States." That is the first provision in the bill. What is meant by the Secretary of War assuming full control over one of the mouths of the Mississippi I do not fully comprehend.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will permit me I will state that they are dredging out one of the mouths of the Mississippi River, and vessels frequently get aground; mud will accumulate around a vessel so situated; and perhaps the whole work that has been accomplished in a month will, in two days, be filled up again by the mud and the waters of the Mississippi River. The engineer in charge says that this is an absolute necessity in case he is to deepen the channel and make it useful to commerce.

Mr. THURMAN. I still do not understand what is meant by the Secretary of War assuming full control over that mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. WEST. Does the Senator inquire what will be the result if the bill is enacted into a law? Is that the object of the question?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will allow me to get through the very few observations I propose to make——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will suspend. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the unfinished business, which is the finance resolution.

Mr. WEST. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to let that matter be laid aside informally till we get through with this bill, as we can in a very few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks that the pending order be laid aside informally. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Subject to a demand for it at any time. With that limitation I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not wish to be considered as unfriendly to this bill, if it is necessary and it is within our competence to pass it; but I really do want to understand what is meant by directing the Secretary of War to assume full control over one of the mouths of the Mississippi River. He is directed absolutely to assume that control, and what that means I confess I do not understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to illustrate?

Mr. THURMAN. I should prefer to make the few remarks that I have to make, and then the Senator can answer at large. What is the Secretary of War to do? Is he to prohibit navigation there, or is he to select what vessels may navigate that mouth and exclude all others? What is meant by his assuming "full control over the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in the course of excavation or improvement?" Is he to sit there and decide what vessels shall navigate it and exclude all others, I repeat, or is he to be allowed to impose an embargo upon all vessels? That is the first statement. Then comes this provision:

And he may establish such regulations respecting the use of, or passage through, such channel as he shall deem needful to fully protect the channel and to facilitate the excavation, improvement, and use thereof. Such regulations shall be promulgated by publication thereof for ten days consecutively in two daily papers published in New Orleans, Louisiana, and the same may in like manner be changed from time to time.

Then comes section 2:

SEC. 2. That if any person shall violate any such regulations, he shall, on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not more than six months, or by both such punishments, in the discretion of the court.

That is to say, the Secretary of War may make a code of laws respecting the navigation of one of the mouths of the Mississippi River, and upon promulgation of that code, by publication for two weeks in a New Orleans paper, then any person who violates one of those regulations of the Secretary of War is liable to a fine of $500 and to imprisonment for six months; and the Secretary of War may from time to time change these regulations as he may see fit. That strikes me as a very extraordinary power. I do think that a bill to protect public works—for that can be the only foundation for this business—could be drafted that would devolve no such discretion upon any officer whatsoever, and would achieve all the purposes that are to be desired. I should like to have some explanation of this new mode of making a penal code in the United States.

Mr. WEST. It must be very well known to the Senate that for a series of years Congress has continuously appropriated sums of money for the excavation of the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi River. If the Senator from Ohio had given attention to the report of the Secretary of War on this subject he would be aware that over one-half, perhaps, of the amount that is annually appropriated is neutralized by such mismanagement at the mouth of the Mississippi River as renders it necessary now, in the opinion of the Committee on Commerce, to make just such regulations as this bill prescribes.

It is true, as the Senator says, that if this power is conferred on the Secretary of War he will have the opportunity of deciding what vessels shall navigate that particular channel; and that is the object of this bill. It is necessary, because, as I say, under existing arrangements, these parties can so obstruct the operations of the Government pursued by its dredge-boats as to neutralize one-half at least of the money that is annually appropriated by Congress. If the Senator will refer to the report of the Secretary of War, on pages 596 to 598 he will find this matter fully elaborated. All the abuses that have been continuously practiced there for years are fully set forth.

The subject was fully examined by the Committee on Transportation during their recent visit there. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] has expressed the views that were entertained by that committee. The chairman of that committee [Mr. WINDOM] is also an advocate of this bill, and presented his opinions and the facts that were collated before the Committee on Commerce yesterday. I do not know that any very great or evil effects can flow out of these regulations. I know that evil effects of the grossest character, disastrous to commerce, result from the want of such regulations. During the war the military authorities controlled the exit and the incoming of vessels on the bar of the Mississippi, and we never had any of this trouble.

Now, the object of this bill is to give the Secretary of War, through his representative on the spot, who is an officer of the Engineer Corps, authority to say when and at what time certain vessels shall make their transit across this bar, with the view of making the total amount of money that is appropriated by Congress thoroughly available. Otherwise, by the obstructions that are constantly put there by the tow-boat association, the dredge-boats have to do and do over again the work of the night the next day. That is the object of this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate at any length on this subject, but will state the conclusions at which the Committee on Transportation Routes arrived while in New Orleans. The object of this bill is to break up one of the most shameless and atrocious monopolies to be found in the United States. I have found nothing anywhere, and have heard of nothing, comparable to this monopoly that holds in its grasp the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Let me give you one or two illustrations of the manner in which they manage that business. There are now twenty-two boats belonging to the tow-boat association. The association consists of a combination of five individual companies. When any competitor comes into the river with a tow-boat, the association at once make use of every means, no matter what they may be, to drive him out of such competition. For instance, cases were presented to the committee that when one of these competing tow-boats had gone out into the Gulf to tow vessels in over the bar, and was discovered by the tow-boat company, they at once brought a vessel on to the bar, or a number of them, and held them there until the captain of the vessel who had placed himself in charge of the competing tow-boat was compelled to hoist the white flag in token of surrender; and as soon as he surrendered to the tow-boat association and gave up the service of the competing tow-boat they would get the vessels that were thrown athwart the bar off, and he would be conducted in. That, we were informed, has been practiced in several instances.

Not to detain the Senate by illustrative instances, I will state the information given to me by Major Howell, who is in charge of that work. The tow-boat companies are not anxious that the depth of water upon the bar should be greater than sixteen or seventeen feet, for the reason that it is very much to their interest to have boats fastened upon the bar. They charge a certain amount per ton—I think it amounts to $1.75 per ton—for towing a vessel over the bar through the mouth of the river to New Orleans and back; and for taking a vessel off the bar they charge so much per hour or so much per tide in addition, which is the most profitable part of their work. Hence, when Major Howell was likely to succeed in deepening the channel to eighteen or possibly nineteen feet, this association brought vessels upon the bar at low tide drawing more water than could possibly be passed over the bar. In one instance, when two of these tow-boats were attached to a large vessel, one on each side, an ostensible disagreement occurred just as the three boats—the two tows and the vessel—entered the channel, and the captain of one tow-boat backed his vessel and the other ran his forward, the result of which was to throw the vessel square across the bar and to keep it there for four or five days, completely closing up the channel. And, as was said by the Senator from Michigan, a vessel grounded in the channel for a few hours obliterates the work done by the Government for months.

Major Howell was compelled to leave the Southwest Pass, on account of the obstructions which were offered by the tow-boat association, and go to Pass à l'Outre. He commenced operations there, and when about to succeed in deepening the channel to the depth of eighteen feet, the tow-boat association followed him to that point and threw another vessel across the channel, apparently with the intention to compel him to suspend work there.

The object of this bill is to break up, so far as possible, this outrageous monopoly, that closes against the commerce of the country the mouth of the Mississippi River. The measure may be somewhat severe, but I think it is no stronger than the circumstances of the case require.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Minnesota has described a very atrocious monopoly, and very atrocious practices of that monopoly, in language very clear and precise. Now, I put it to him, is he not competent to draft a bill that shall prevent any such outrage, instead of submitting the drafting of such regulations to the Secretary of War? Is the Secretary of War any more competent than the Senator from Minnesota to provide laws to punish such conduct? Congress has power to regulate commerce. It certainly has power to protect the mouth of the Mississippi or any other navigable river or harbor of the United States; but where is the authority of Congress to delegate that power to the Secretary of War and enable him to make a code of criminal law? That is what I want to know.

I believe there are already laws in force, and if I had time I could hunt them up, for punishing any obstruction of the channel of any harbor in the United States, and punishing it severely. Nor do I doubt for one moment that a revenue-cutter of the United States could drag out of that channel any such obstruction as these tow-boats have created, as described by the Senator from Minnesota. I have no doubt of the power of a revenue-cutter to protect the channel, by compelling by force any willful obstruction to be removed, if it were necessary, under existing laws; but if they have not discharged that duty, it is because they have not received the proper instructions to do it.

But if there is a defect in the existing laws, let us make the necessary laws. The power belongs to us under the Constitution, and I want to know where we find the right to delegate that power to the Secretary of War. I know very well that there are various provisions in the statutes authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, for instance, to make certain rules and regulations, and perhaps authorizing each head of a Department to make certain rules and regulations; but I do not believe you can find in any one of those statutes such a delegation of power as this bill proposes to make to the Secretary of War. I cannot vote for that. I will vote with the Senator from Minnesota for as stringent a law as he can draw up, as effective a law as he can draw up, to protect the free navigation of that channel and to protect the works and improvements of the United States. That I will do; but let him draw it up and submit it to the Senate for consideration, and not propose that we shall delegate this power to the Secretary of War, for him to make a code of laws and change it at his pleasure and as his subordinates down there (for he cannot know anything about it except what they may report to him) may from time to time advise him to establish as the law of the land. I cannot agree to make laws, penal laws, laws that impose fines of large amounts of money and imprisonment for six months, in any such way as that. The laws ought to be made by Congress, and not by the Secretary of War or his subordinates.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, to-day the use of the channel over the Saint Clair flats is prohibited without law. The engineer in charge came to me and said, "This work cannot be done if vessels are allowed to pass through the canal." Said I, "Why do you not put out your lights and stop the use of the channel?" Said he, "I do not know that I have authority of law to do that." I replied, "Take the responsibility, for the work must be done." That has been done, and it is a case exactly parallel with this deepening of the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River. Unless the engineer in charge has the absolute power to stop its use by vessels for the time being—and this bill only provides that while the work is going on he shall have that power—he never will open that channel.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Ohio suggests that these regulations should be made by law. I might ask the Senator whether that is entirely practicable or not. They are such regulations as will protect the work that is being done, and perhaps may require to be changed from time to time in a way that they could not be changed by an act of Congress. They would have to be suggested, undoubtedly, by the engineer in charge of the work, to be approved by the Secretary of War, and to become his regulations. Now, is there any want of power upon our part to say that if any person shall knowingly and willfully violate the necessary regulations to protect the public work that is going on, which may be adopted by the Secretary of War, of which the party shall have full notice, he shall be punished for it? It seems to me not. It seems to me to be one of those cases where it must be left to the officers in charge of the work to prescribe the particular regulations that may be necessary to protect the work going on.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I was in New Orleans during the last season, and am perfectly convinced of all that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has said in regard to the abuse which he desires to correct there, and I am in full accord with him in correcting it; but it seems to me that this bill is as clearly unconstitutional as a bill could be made. The power of Congress to regulate commerce is unquestioned. That power extends to precisely the difficulty under consideration. We may pass any law for the purpose of regulating it, and affix any penalties for violation of that law which we see fit; but can we say that the Secretary of War shall pass laws and affix penalties, and change them every hour, and then allow a recovery of those fines and penalties in the Federal courts? That is a delegation of the power to regulate commerce as much as anything could be that could possibly be conceived of. In my judgment the bill would be so void on its face that not one of these penalties could be recovered. The end which the bill seeks to reach would be defeated whenever it was sought to be enforced in any court.

Mr. MORTON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the bill contains a section which he thinks it does not. This bill provides what the penalties shall be for violating the regulations: "If any person shall violate any such regulations he shall, on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by a fine," &c.

Mr. CARPENTER. That makes it a great deal worse. I was not aware it was so bad as that. The idea of fixing a penalty here in advance, and then letting another officer of the Government, and that a military officer, determine what shall come within that fixed penalty, is a worse provision than I supposed was in the bill. How would an indictment be framed? How would it conclude? Not "contrary to the peace," not "contrary to the statute," but contrary to some changing and fluctuating regulation.

Mr. THURMAN. "Contrary to the Secretary of War."

Mr. CARPENTER. "Contrary to the Secretary of War," as the Senator from Ohio suggests.

Mr. President, the very object these Senators all have in view I have just as much in view as they have, and I will do anything on earth to reach it and cure it; but I will not sit here and vote for a bill which, in my judgment, would be utterly worthless when it was passed, and would leave this abuse to exist just as freely afterward as before the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I happened to be at the mouth of the Mississippi River some time ago, and saw the necessity for some legislation on this subject to give the proper officers of the Government additional power to protect their work from actual destruction. Cases occurred there where in a single night, or a single day, the work done by the Government for the benefit of the whole people of the United States was destroyed, and it was believed maliciously destroyed, by a private company to advance their own interests and to obstruct commerce. That ought to be put a stop to. Everybody felt that. The difficulty I have is with the punitive section of this bill. The first section, it seems to me, is right enough, giving to the Secretary of War power to make rules and regulations which affect the conduct of his own officers, which shall give them authority to seize a vessel that is engaged in an obstruction, give them suitable power over the property and officers of the United States. But it seems to me there would be a practical difficulty in allowing the courts to punish a man for doing that which is prohibited not by law, but by a regulation of an executive officer. There is the difficulty in the case. The first section of the bill, I believe, would answer every purpose by giving the Secretary of War power to prevent these obstructions. He has not got it now. I should vote for this bill with great pleasure if the last section was stricken out, which I think would be inoperative.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly agree, Mr. President, with what has been said by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Wisconsin, and I would suggest an amendment to the bill, so that it would read in this way:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War is directed to take possession of the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States, and hold possession thereof until such improvements are perfected.

That is just putting this channel of the river in his possession until the work is done.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose his possession is violated?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If it was in his possession he would take care of his possession, the same as my friend would of the possession of his house.

Mr. MORTON. How will he take care of it if it is violated, unless there is some provision of law?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He would not have it violated. He would have a revenue-cutter there, and he would have a sufficient force there to hold possession.

Mr. MORTON. That is to give him arbitrary power with the Army and Navy, if he cannot do it by law. That makes it worse and worse.

Mr. CONKLING. This bill comes from the Committee on Commerce. When it was first considered I was present in the committee, and for reasons which have been substantially stated here I could not concur in reporting the bill. Subsequently, at a meeting when I was not present and was not in the city, the bill in its present form was agreed to, an amendment having, as the print will show, in the mean time been suggested. That amendment obviates an apparent and obvious objection which, I think, obtained to the original bill; but still I cannot see, any better than Senators around me are able to see, how, within our power, we can undertake such a mission of legislation as this. The Senator from Wisconsin says that Congress has power to regulate commerce. Yes; and Congress has power to establish post-roads, and of course to enact a crimes-act, as one was enacted in 1825, for example, copious in denunciation of offenses against the mails; but can anybody suppose that Congress could delegate to the Postmaster-General the right, by regulation, by a ukase, by an ipse dixit of his own, to provide that the doing of certain things with the mails should be felonies or even misdemeanors, and then to subject to trial and punishment all persons who should violate those regulations? I suppose there is no magic in this respect about the commercial clause of the Constitution, as it is called. It performs its purpose here, and that is to bring this subject clearly within the domain which Congress may occupy in legislating. But, having jurisdiction of the subject, Congress itself must govern, as it does in all other cases; and to say that you can confer upon an executive officer, upon the head of a Department, (upon whom the Constitution permits us to confer the power of appointing subordinate officials,) or upon anybody else, the discretion to determine what shall and what shall not constitute a felony or misdemeanor—for this must be one or the other—and then set grand juries at work, as they would under a penal statute, seems to me an idea resting upon some reasoning quite beyond my conception.

Now, Mr. President, I am inclined to think—and I rose chiefly to make that suggestion in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey—that the practical way out of this difficulty would be just such an amendment as he proposes, and coupled with it a provision which, as has been said, it is quite likely might not cover all the contrivances of ingenuity or deviltry if any one wants to impair this work maliciously, would nevertheless cover in the main such acts of interference and aggression as are apprehended there, and would clothe the Secretary of War with the power, as a police power, to maintain the physical custody of that work, and maintain it against all comers, so that he would not be bound to fold his hands and let some one come with a sailing vessel or steamer and block the mouth and lie there, or run over the work, or in any way interfere with it. My friend from Indiana remarked that such an idea would import that he might use the Army and the Navy to maintain his custody.

Mr. MORTON. I did not remark that.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator from Indiana remarked it; and certainly there was occasion for it, because if you merely should put this work into the custody of the Secretary of War, and then intimate, negatively or positively, that he is to do what he pleases, there would be much latitude for imagination and conception of what was intended; but if you put it in his custody, and then provide a penalty for all the acts which are stated to us as the acts which have been committed and such others as may reasonably be denounced, and then authorize the Secretary of War to enforce this statute, I think you will give him physical power enough to maintain the police of the work, and you will lay down a penal code which, although it may not cover everything that could be covered by regulations, to be changed from time to time, will nevertheless be going about as far as we prudently can.

Mr. President, a day or two ago some Senator mentioned to me, in answer to a remark about this bill, that in the revenue laws Congress had frequently enacted that the Secretary of the Treasury might make regulations so and so, and that those regulations should be enforced. I speak without being positive on this point; but I know of no example which would not be covered by the statement I am going to make, when I say that I conceive the distinction between all those cases and this case is very apparent. In a revenue statute you denounce as offenses certain acts; you denounce smuggling as an offense, and various other acts; you affix the penalty. The whole thing is definite. You can lay the offense in an indictment. Then you provide that, to carry out this act in its various forms, the Secretary of the Treasury may make regulations, and accordingly he regulates the blanks, the forms of proceeding, the forms of manifest, the forms of income-tax returns under the income-tax law, and so on, all in aid of a substantive and perfect statute or section, penal in its character, and describing the offense. It is merely in aid of a statute which is substantial and complete without it, except that, as mere matter of mode of administration, you commit to the Secretary the power to furnish legs and wings, so to speak, for the law to move. But when, denouncing no offense whatever, describing no act which you prohibit, you commit a naked, unbridled discretion to an executive officer, to create, to establish, foundation, superstructure, and all, that act which shall constitute a penal offense, and be triable upon presentation by a grand jury, then it seems to me that you depart from all likeness and analogy to the other case, and you undertake an entirely different matter.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, there is a very decided expression of opinion here, on the part of several eminent Senators, that this provision of the law is unconstitutional. Now, sir, I submit that the Senators have shown its constitutionality by the very argument they make against it; and I venture to say that there are scores of laws now upon the statute-book that embody substantially this same principle.

The proposition insisted upon is, that it is not competent for us to authorize the Secretary of War, or any officer who is head of a Department, to make regulations for the preservation of the public property; and that we cannot provide a penalty for punishing any one who violates those regulations, after having been fully informed in regard to them. If it had not been for the very distinguished gentlemen who have advanced that idea, I should simply call it absurd. It is necessary, in the very nature of things, that the officers in charge of public works should have the power sometimes to make regulations for their protection; and those regulations amount to nothing unless persons can be punished for violating them—regulations that Congress cannot make; regulations that must be varied, perhaps, from time to time, but which are of themselves useless unless men can be punished for violating them.

Now, we cannot give to the Secretary of War the power to determine that he will assess a fine, and to assess it himself; nor can we give him power to affix a penalty where the law affixes none; but we can say that he shall have power to make regulations which may be necessary for the protection of a public work, and that any person who willfully violates those regulations shall be punished according to the penalty that is prescribed by law; and I have no doubt there are scores of statutes which contain just such provisions, and I see no objection whatever, so far as the Constitution is concerned.

I want now to say one word in regard to the suggestion of my friend from New Jersey and the suggestion of my friend from New York. I insist that they suggest that which would be palpably unconstitutional. I take exception myself to the first part of the language contained in this bill, and I think the objection made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to that part is well taken. The provision is:

That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War is directed to assume full control over the particular channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States.

I doubt very much whether we have the power to pass that. We have no right to give him the full control over the mouth of that channel. We cannot oust the jurisdiction that Louisiana has over it. She has a certain jurisdiction over it, under the Constitution of the United States, that we cannot take away from her, and we cannot give absolutely to the Secretary of War——

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator from New Jersey has proposed to change those words.

Mr. MORTON. No; I think the Senator from New Jersey justified those words.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Indiana will pardon me a moment, I understood my friend from New Jersey to suggest that this language be so changed as to give the Secretary of War the control of the work and whatever pertained to that. If these words are so broad as to embrace the whole channel, I should be inclined to agree with the Senator from Indiana about that. I had not had my attention drawn to that; on the contrary, I supposed, it was to give him control of so much as was occupied by the work at the time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Neither Senator is entirely correct. The amendment which I suggested was "that the Secretary of War take possession of the particular channel of the mouth of the Mississippi River in course of excavation or improvement by the Government of the United States, and hold possession thereof until such improvements are perfected." And then I have added, "and any person interfering with such possession or the prosecution of the said improvements shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court." An act so worded, it seems to me, clearly shows that the Government of the United States, which has the right to regulate commerce, is carrying on improvements at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and it authorizes the protection of those improvements and possession of the mouth for the purposes of those improvements, and I think it is perfectly constitutional and would meet the end.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPENCER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. MORTON. I have the floor, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana has not yielded the floor, except temporarily.

Mr. MORTON. I was simply going to say, on the constitutional point raised by the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, that he makes a distinction without any difference in regard to the power. We can give the Secretary of War the right to take possession only so far as that possession is necessary in order to make these improvements. We can give him possession to that extent and no further. We cannot give him exclusive possession to oust the jurisdiction of the State of Louisiana.

Now, Mr. President, what does the Senator suggest? That the Secretary of War shall take possession for these purposes, and then he provides that anybody who disturbs that possession shall be punished so and so. What is the constitutional difference between that and authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations for the perservation of that property, and punishing any person for violating those regulations? If there be any difference, I confess it is a difference of circumstances but no difference of principle. If we have the power to do the one, we have the power to do the other. I think I could suggest an amendment to this bill which would obviate the principal objection to it, but I merely speak to the constitutional point that has been raised to-day. According to my mind, there is nothing in it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. If my colleague will give way now, I will move to recommit the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the bill ought to be recommitted, but before that is done I wish to make a few observations, for I have been looking into this matter a little since this debate sprang up, and I believe this is the first bill of this kind that ever has been before Congress, for, strangely enough, on a hasty looking into the statutes I find no statute to protect any harbor of the United States, or the channels leading into any harbor of the United States from malicious obstruction. If there be any such statute I do not find it in the index to Brightly, and I think it would be found there if there were any such statute. It is very singular indeed, with the many ports that we have, the many channels over which we have complete jurisdiction, that no law should exist for their protection against malicious obstructions. If a careful scrutiny shall develop the fact that that is the case, that there is such a defect in our statutes, the sooner it can be remedied the better.

Then, again, I do not find any statute to protect the works of the United States in course of construction, whether they be buildings or canals, or railroads, or the improvement of a harbor or river. Certainly some act on that subject is necessary.

So the Senate will see that this is an exceedingly large subject which is brought to our notice by this bill, and I do believe that the very best thing that the Committee on Commerce could do, which contains gentlemen acquainted with commerce, and also some of the best lawyers in the Senate, would be to frame a general law, which should protect the harbors and channels of the United States from obstruction, and protect the public works in course of construction, from being unlawfully interfered with; and such a bill could, by the use of proper pains, be prepared that would apply to the whole United States, and would cover this case completely.

In respect to the delegation of this power to the Secretary of War, I am a little surprised after the very clear and, in my judgment, perfectly unanswerable statement by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] of the difference in principle which lies between those regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury and some other Secretaries, and the provision of this bill, a distinction broad and plain to the legal mind, that there should be any hesitancy at all in pronouncing this bill to be unconstitutional. Why, sir, if you can delegate this power to the Secretary of War in respect to one of the mouths of the Mississippi, you may delegate it to the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to another mouth of the Mississippi, and to the Secretary of State in regard to another mouth, and to the collector of customs in regard to another channel, and to some surveyor of a port in regard to the harbor at New York, and so on, and you may delegate it in fact to a private individual, and say that what A B or C D, a private individual, declares shall be a punishable offense, shall be punished in the courts of the United States by fine and imprisonment. Why, sir, it will not do at all.

Now, having said this much, I hope that my colleague will make his motion, and that this bill will go back, and that instead of this particular bill, which is to remedy evils that we all want to remedy, the Committee on Commerce will frame a general law to protect the channels of commerce and the harbors of the United States from unlawful obstruction to the full extent of our constitutional power to do so, and to protect the public works of the United States while they are in course of construction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order; but I will first move by general consent that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. WEST. I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey be printed and recommitted also.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have modified the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the regular order, which is the finance resolution.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a financial speech, but if no other gentleman desires to occupy the floor at this moment, I will say a few words in regard to the resolution under consideration. This is a subject which involves a great deal of both general and special information which I do not possess. However I have some general ideas which I can state in a few words.

I believe that it would be highly injurious to this country to again inflate the currency. I do not believe there is any public necessity for such a movement. I think the time has come when we should take steps in the direction of redeeming our plighted faith. We have issued paper which is a promise to pay, called a legal-tender. I think that we should take steps towards complying with that promise at the earliest possible moment. I think this is the time. Whatever we do should be in that direction. I need not enlarge upon the evils of a depreciated currency. This country has felt them too severely to require that I should mention them. It matters not what kind of a depreciated currency you have, it necessarily entails many evils. It is true that the depreciated currency spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yesterday, if such a thing could be as a fixed depreciation, a fixed value below the gold standard, would be less objectionable than a fluctuating depreciated currency; but I apprehend that such a thing as a fixed depreciating currency has not existed and will not exist. It varies almost daily; and the merchants and brokers and middle-men who are between the producers and the consumers, derive advantage from that condition of things.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I do not desire to interrupt his speech, but merely to call his attention to one word which is coming into common use in the Senate, and I believe elsewhere, and that is the word "inflation." Gentlemen here who are in favor of a return to specie payments use the word "inflation" as applicable to gentlemen who are in favor of a moderate increase of the currency. I do not understand that to be inflation by any means. You cannot inflate the currency until the currency is up to the standard of necessity, and then an increase would be inflation. It is a question whether the currency is up to that standard, and not a question of inflation; and the word "inflation" as it is used here seems to be a very improper one. If I understand it, and if Worcester and Webster understood it, it means "to puff up," "fill up," and "swell out." Gentlemen may be inflated sometimes, but the currency is not, by any means.

Mr. STEWART. Then the idea is that there is no such thing as inflation—puffing a thing up until it is full. I suppose the next step after you have got it full would be to burst it, so that I understand there is no such thing as inflation, but there must be an explosion, because certainly if the process of filling up is not inflation, then the next step after the thing is full would be explosion. Inflation does not exist, but explosion is what the Senator would have us look after. He thinks there is no particular danger of inflation.

I do not care about stepping aside from the few remarks I have to make to criticise language, because I do not propose to use any technical terms, but only those we are familiar with, in regard to finance. I say a depreciated currency is attended with a great many evils. The middle-men provide against it. In shipping grain, as was illustrated, from Illinois to Liverpool, every person who handles that grain will insure himself against these fluctuations. He will charge a higher commission. If the grain is to remain in his possession, step by step, he will insure against fluctuations; and every one between the producer and consumer will insure himself against them. It is not a fact with a fluctuating currency that the value of wheat in Illinois is the price in Liverpool, less the cost of transportation to Liverpool. When you have a depreciated currency you have not only to take into account transportation, but you have to take into account the insurance that every man who handles the wheat will take against the change in the price in gold constantly coming upon him. It gives speculators and middle-men a chance to cut both ways and eat up the consumer and the producer. We have seen that most effectually.

Gold is the real measure of value. If you have a gold standard, the middle-men and traders need no security, no extra percentage to guard them against these fluctuations. If you have that simple standard you can have the fair measurement, the fair difference, the transportation from Illinois to Liverpool. Then the measure of value in Illinois will be the price in Liverpool less the cost of transportation. Now, the measure of value is the price in Liverpool, with the cost of transportation and the insurance against fluctuations in currency deducted, and they have proved ruinous. There is nothing so satisfactory as the real measure of value, gold. Without going to the real measure of value, you must have arbitrary amounts of currency or you must have fluctuations; you must have constant legislation as to the amount of circulation; you must have a cramped, uncertain circulation; and you will have these discussions constantly. But suppose you adopt what the world adopts as the measure of value for your currency, then what will you have? Then you can have all the currency which you have got money to buy. You will have the world's currency. You can have all the money then that you have got the representative of value for. You can have inflation then on a sound basis.

I know no method by which we can determine how much money is wanted in this country. I have found nobody in this Chamber who knew anything about it. Some say $700,000,000; some say $600,000,000; some say $1,000,000,000. How are you going to measure or determine it? Some Senators ask legislation to deal out so much more currency. Sir, you want currency enough to do the business of the country, and when you adopt the measure of value that the world recognizes you will have sufficient money to do the business of the country with, the same as they do anywhere else; because if you have got crops to move and you have a necessity for money, the world will come to your aid at once; but if you have a depreciated currency that drives all the rest out, that prevents your using gold, then you will have these same difficulties.

It seems to me that we are better situated now than we ever were before, if we can get to a specie basis, that is, let gold be the measure of value, as the world recognizes it to be. That being done, I would say, let the United States furnish the currency, and let us have free banking, and I do not know who will be hurt by it.

Mr. CONKLING. Have we not free banking on a coin basis now?

Mr. STEWART. No; we have not free banking on a coin basis now. That is one of the difficulties about that law. In the first place, the law requires an unnecessary amount of securities, and it only allows the issuance of 80 per cent. It requires the deposit of bonds which are above par or equal to par in gold, and only allows the issuance of 80 per cent. of notes. Then it limits the capital of the bank issuing to $1,000,000, and it is so restricted and limited that it is practically of very little use. If we had free gold banking on the Pacific coast, everybody would adopt it. If we had free banking on a gold basis, without restriction, so that each institution could have such a capital as it thinks sufficient to do business upon, it would be adopted generally upon the Pacific coast. But it is limited so that it is not free and cannot be used. There are half a dozen institutions there with a larger capital stock than is allowed under the law. A million of dollars will not do the business of a bank there. If these restrictions were removed, we should have free banking on a gold basis on the Pacific coast, and it ought to be done.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will permit me, there is one question that I should like to have some one answer in the course of this debate. In arriving at the amount of currency necessary for the business of the country, when two or three parties who might be mentioned can in the city of New York, by obtaining three or four millions and locking it up a few days, disturb the business relations of the whole country, is not that a fact in itself which shows to the world that there is not a sufficient amount of currency in the country to prevent a disarrangement of business by the withdrawal of a very small portion of it from the volume?

Mr. STEWART. I suppose that in any town, if there was a sufficient amount of currency, rich men might combine and make it scarce for the time being. I do not think that is a conclusive argument at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not mean that it is conclusive; but if three or four millions taken from the great volume of the currency and locked up in New York, will derange the business of the whole country, is not that a fact of itself having some weight, showing the inadequacy of the volume of currency to perform the functions that it is intended to perform?

Mr. STEWART. I do not see why we could not have all the money we want if we were on a gold basis. All agree that there would then be no necessity for a limitation upon the currency. All agree that a limitation might be avoided. The discussions that are constantly arising here about the quantity of currency would be disposed of. We would have gold, which would supplement the bills of the United States. Suppose the United States should issue bills, gold-notes, and should let the banks have them for circulation; they would be the equivalent of coin, and they would be supplemental to buy gold; and your currency would necessarily be elastic, although the amount of circulation was fixed. Suppose you felt it necessary to fix your circulation, and you fixed it at $500,000,000, although I do not think that would be necessary; I think that could be arranged in the banking law, so that it need not be fixed at all; but if it was fixed, there would be something with which to supplement it. Now, when there is a stringency, you have nothing to supplement your currency with. You cannot call on the balance of the world. If they send their gold over here, it is at a discount; it cannot be used, it cannot be thrown into circulation—it is a commodity, it is not a legal tender. You cannot pay debts with gold, except at a ruinous sacrifice. You cannot use it. Your mints go on coining, but they do not increase the volume of your circulation.

If you adopted the universal measure of value—gold—as your basis, then your circulation would be flexible, and it would be much harder to make a "corner" on the gold in this country, on the circulation of the country, which would distribute itself according to the laws of trade throughout the country, than it would on a fixed amount of greenbacks that was fixed arbitrarily. You can figure all the time upon that. You know that the paper circulation is the only circulation there can be, because it is a depreciated currency, and you cannot trade in anything else. You know just exactly how much it is. But if we had a gold basis, speculators would not know how much it was and they ought not to know, and nobody ought to know how much circulation there is in the country. It is a fact that had better not be known. There would be less chance for corners if the currency consisted of gold deposited everywhere, distributed everywhere throughout the country, and it was all the circulating medium there was, than there is now.

I think the step suggested by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is certainly a safe one. That is, to issue bonds, sell them, get gold if you can, and leave the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed in this direction toward resumption, if the prosperity of the country will allow it. I do not believe in going to England or France to beg them to take our bonds; but if there are seasons of the year in which our bonds can be sold, let them be sold, and let us accumulate gold; let us pass a law for free banking; perfect the system of free gold banking, and thus proceed towards resumption. It seems to me the road is plain. If we do not get there, if the Secretary is not able to get there, no harm will be done. The country will understand that that is the direction in which we are traveling. We are attempting, then, to redeem our promises; we are attempting to put ourselves in harmony with the commercial world; we are attempting to get rid of an irredeemable currency; we are attempting to put trade and commerce upon a substantial basis; we are attempting then to get rid of the insurance that every middle-man takes in consequence of the fluctuations of the currency. It seems to me that in traveling in that direction there is more light.

But suppose you do as you have done before, issue more currency; suppose you issue one hundred millions, or fifty millions, or two hundred millions, what will be the inevitable result? Everybody understands what must be the result of doing that. The result will be to excite speculation, and the consequence of that speculation will be that more men will get into debt, and the final result will be another crash; and when you attempt again to place your currency upon a substantial basis you will meet with this same difficulty; you will be told that it is going to injure the debtor class; that you will ruin a great many men. I undertake to say that in time of peace we ought not to encourage speculation again until we get upon a healthy basis, until we get it down to where the legitimate growth of the country will warrant it, and where the speculation is based upon the real measure of value. We ought not to invite another class of men to get into debt and break by dealing out to them more paper money and helping them on in this way. It seems to me the necessary effect of such a measure is too plain for argument. I hope it will not be done.

I think a step toward specie payment is just what is demanded. The country can stand it now better than it could at almost any other time. We have had the panic, we have had the crash, and when we build up again let us build up on solid foundations. Then the world will have notice of what we intend. But if we take a step backward now, in time of peace, we shall be unable to retrace it, and you will have this fluctuating currency, this uncertainty, and the damaging effect upon the commerce and enterprise of the country which uncertainty always produces for the next ten years. There is no necessity for that. Let us have certainty. Let us move forward toward the redemption of the greenbacks; and when it is understood that that is the policy of the Government the people will sustain it and they will be prepared for it.

This is all I have to say. I do not propose to elaborate these views, and I did not intend to say as much as I have already said.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no purpose of addressing myself to the pending resolution, but I wish to make a statement which I desire the chairman of the Committee on Finance to hear. I reported this morning a bill from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, abolishing the office of first assistant internal revenue commissioner, a bill that has the approval of the Department and has passed the House of Representatives, and to which I suppose there is no objection in the world. I have a telegram this moment from the Department, stating that it is important that the bill should be passed as soon as possible; and among other reasons, though it is not stated in this telegram, I may mention that the civil-service commission are about to proceed to examine candidates to fill this place, and it is important, if the bill is to pass at all, that it should be passed at once. I therefore trust that there may be unanimous consent that the pending resolution may be laid aside, and that we be allowed to take up this bill and pass it, inasmuch as it is important that it should be disposed of at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending resolution informally, with a view to take up the bill reported by him to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. I shall be compelled to object, and when the bill comes up I will state my reasons for the objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I hope it will not be taken up now. I should have no objection to the bill being taken up if it could be passed without opposition; but as that cannot be done, I hope we shall proceed with the pending resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to the resolution.

Mr. BAYARD. I trust the debate on this all-important subject will not terminate suddenly, because there are a number of members of the Senate who desire to be heard and who are not prepared to-day to go on with the debate. I hope the chairman of the committee, who has this matter generally in charge, will recognize the wisdom and propriety of allowing further time for this discussion. The tone of the discussion has certainly been very creditable to the intent of the parties engaged in it. It is a very vast subject, and the steps which we are called upon to take will be very far-reaching in their effects upon the welfare and prosperity of the citizens of the United States in every portion of the Union. I trust there will be no haste to take votes upon the measures touched upon in the course of this discussion. There should be time for debate, and the time is well expended in debate; and understanding that there are a number of members of the Senate who desire still to be heard upon the general propositions embraced in the various resolutions submitted to the Senate, I hope that the resolution, if no one is prepared to discuss it now, will be laid aside informally, in order that early in the next week it may be resumed. I need not say how little disposed I am to a waste of time; but there can be no better bestowal of time than in a full and deliberate discussion upon this subject. I hope no vote will be pressed until every one who desires to be heard upon the subject (and I may here say I am but one of several who propose to address the Senate upon it) shall be allowed to do so.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather that that motion were withheld for a moment, until this question is disposed of. In regard to the pending debate, I am entirely indifferent as to the time when it is brought to a conclusion or as to the order of its procedure. I desire to get a vote as soon as possible; but it is a very important subject, and I do not desire to press a vote until Senators are fully heard upon it. If the Senator from Delaware says that he would rather speak on Monday, and others are in the same condition, I have no objection to allowing the resolution to go over. I will inquire of the Senator from Indiana if it is likely that his privileged question will take very much time on Monday?

Mr. MORTON. Not that I know of. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor upon it.

Mr. McCREERY. I wish to speak on that subject on Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I move that the pending resolution be postponed until Tuesday, it still remaining the special order, as a matter of course.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. I now move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL

Mr. SHERMAN. I now appeal to the Senate to take up the bill in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal. I think in five minutes I can show the necessity of passing it.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senator will not press his motion, but will allow me now to call up and have disposed of the post-route bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill will take but a few moments. The Senator from Michigan, who objected a moment ago, mistook the bill. I think I shall be able to show the Senate in five minutes the importance of passing it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

It proposes to continue in full force the appropriations made by the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the payment of the debts of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and to make them permanently applicable to the payments of the debts of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and so much as may be necessary is to be applied to the payment of the interest as it accrues, and the principal of the outstanding bonds of the company as they mature; but the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase and pay for any of the bonds, at their market price, whenever he deems it for the interest of the United States. After thirty days from the passage of the act, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to take possession of the canal and all the property, real and personal, of the company as the property of the United States, subject, however, to the mortgage lien on the property in favor of the trustees under the mortgage and the holders of the bonds issued under it; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to the directors of the company for the stock held by them, and he is directed to cause a careful and full examination of all the receipts and disbursements of the company to be made, and to collect, and, if necessary, to sue for, any money due to or held for the company by the directors, or by the trustees under the mortgage, or by any person whatever. The canal and property appertaining thereto are to be held for the common use and benefit of the people of the United States, free of all tolls and charges, except such as are necessary to pay the current expenses of the canal; and to ascertain what rates will pay current expenses, the Secretary of the Treasury is, on the first Monday of January of each year, to ascertain from the expenditures of the previous year what tolls will probably pay the expenses for the current year, and he is to fix and declare the rate of tolls thus ascertained to be charged for the current year.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate will listen for a few minutes, I think I can show the importance of immediate action on this bill.

At the last session of Congress an appropriation was made to pay the debts of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and to assume possession of the canal by the Government of the United States. These debts are in the form of outstanding bonds to the amount of about $1,000,000, some of which are not due for twenty years. The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report says that it was impossible to get these bonds in, because the holders would not sell them at what he regarded as their market price and market value. They were not due, and therefore he could not pay them in pursuance of the appropriation made by law. He asks Congress in his annual report, and also in a special report which is before the Senate, to authorize him to pay the interest on the bonds and to pay the principal when they mature, or at his discretion, when the bondholders will sell them at a reasonable rate, to buy them at their market price. The bill appropriates no money whatever, but simply continues permanently the appropriation already made, to be invested in the mode and manner pointed out by the bill. That is all there is in it, and the necessity of its passage is apparent, because if it is not passed, this money will lapse into the Treasury and the present tolls of fifty cents a ton will be continued.

I do not think it necessary to say more on the subject. I can have the report of the Secretary of the Treasury read if it is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendments, which were in section 3, line 5, after the word "canal" to insert, "and for the present year they shall be at the rate of ten cents per ton capacity on vessels propelled by steam and five cents per ton on other vessels;" and in line 6 of the same section after the word "expenses" to insert "for the present year;" so that the section will read:

That the said canal and property appertaining thereto shall be held for the common use and benefit of the people of the United States, free of all tolls and charges, except such as are necessary to pay the current expenses of said canal, and for the present year they shall be at the rate of ten cents per ton capacity on vessels propelled by steam, and five cents per ton on other vessels; and to ascertain what rates will pay current expenses for the present year, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on the first Monday of January of each year, ascertain from the expenditures of the previous year what tolls will probably pay the expenses for the current year, and he shall fix and declare the rate of tolls thus ascertained to be charged for the current year.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to amend the bill by inserting at the proper place "not above par," so that the provision will be that the Secretary may buy these bonds at the market value, not above par. I will say that they have never been above par, and it is not likely that there will be any practical force in this amendment, but it may guard against danger.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to that. It ought to be inserted at the end of the proviso to the first section.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the chairman of the committee whether he has considered the question that this amendment may delay the taking up of these bonds until after the appropriation lapses.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. The interest is paid in the mean time. If the holders will not surrender these bonds at a fair price, that is under par at their market value, the Secretary can pay the interest, so that it makes no difference; the appropriation is continued. That probably will be the result.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add at the end of the proviso of the first section:

And provided, That such price shall not be above par.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can insert it in fewer words.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the Secretary interline it so as to read "at the market value not above par."

Mr. SHERMAN. That will answer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes.

Mr. GORDON. I ask the present consideration of the bill introduced by me some days ago for the removal of the disabilities of Mr. Cabell, of Dallas, Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a motion pending of the Senator from Minnesota to take up the post-route bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think that bill can be disposed of in a few minutes now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, to the amendment of Mr. PRATT.

The amendment was to add as a new section the following:

That all bridges heretofore or hereafter to be erected over the navigable rivers in the United States, or over lakes or the outlets of lakes, or over arms of the sea, or other bodies of water, and all public roads established or hereafter to be established in the States or Territories by competent authority and used as public highways, be, and the same are hereby, established post-roads.

The amendment to the amendment was to insert after the word "highways" the words "leading from one town to another or from one village to another."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I modify my amendment, in order to meet the idea of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] by adding to it the words, "or from any railroad depot to any town or village."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MORTON. With or without the amendment submitted by the Senator from Vermont just now, I insist that the amendment of my colleague, coupled with that offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] which I believe he accepted——

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I insist that the whole amendment is clearly unconstitutional, and that it would be a violation of the Constitution that would be dangerous. I agree with the reasoning suggested by my colleague the other day, that we might as well take his amendment as to go on the way we have been going; but is this not a proper time to put a check to this whole class of legislation? What is the effect of these amendments? It is to make every bridge, canal, river, railroad, dirt-road, township road, neighborhood road, that is called a public highway by the laws of the State, a post-road, and then to authorize the Postmaster-General to put mail service upon such roads as he thinks proper. I submit that this is an attempt to delegate to the Postmaster-General a power that is vested in Congress. It is an attempt to delegate an express legislative power. The power to establish post-roads is one of the express legislative powers conferred upon Congress. "The Congress shall have power to establish post-offices and post-roads." This amendment gives that power to the Postmaster-General. In general terms it makes all roads of every description post roads. That of itself amounts to nothing. What is the essence of the power to establish a post-road? It is to designate a road upon which the mail shall be carried and requiring it to be carried upon that road, and providing the means for carrying it upon that road. That is the essence of the power. A mere declaration that a road is a post-road, but not putting service upon it, is a nullity. The essence of the power is to put the mail upon it and have it carried there. It is an important legislative power, and it was never intended that that power should be delegated, nor have we the right to delegate it, to the Postmaster-General or to anybody else.

Why, Mr. President, just see how this principle would operate now. I will take several of the legislative powers included in the same article:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

Have we the power to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to levy a tax? We have just as much power to authorize him to levy a tax as we have to authorize the Postmaster-General to determine whether the mail shall be put upon a particular route or not. Suppose we were to pass a law saying that $100,000,000 of taxes should be levied and collected, and then authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to select the articles upon which taxes shall be levied and to fix the amount in each case, would anybody pretend that that would be constitutional? And yet what does this amendment propose? To make formally every railroad, dirt road, and cross-road in the United States a post-road, and then leave to the Postmaster-General to determine whether the mail service shall go upon it or not; in other words, to leave to him the essence of the whole power.

Mr. PRATT. Will my colleague allow me to correct him at this point? That is not the extent of the amendment which I offered. If he will examine it carefully he will discover that by our previous legislation we have from time to time, in so many words, made all the plank roads in the country post-roads; all the railroads in the country post-roads; all the streets in the fifty-two cities in which the free-delivery system prevails post-roads; all the canals of the United States post-roads. My amendment simply goes a step further in the same direction, and proposes that instead of enumerating, as in the present bill, thirty-three particular routes in the State of Alabama, which shall be post-roads, and so many in another State, so many in a Territory, we declare in general terms that all the roads in the States and Territories established by competent authority, and used as highways, shall be deemed post-roads. So my colleague will perceive that my amendment is strictly in the line of legislation that has been going on here from the beginning. Congress first, I believe, attempted to generalize in the way of navigable rivers and lakes.

Mr. MORTON. I intended to state as much. I am satisfied the amendment is in the line of previous legislation. It is quite as constitutional as the acts referred to by my colleague; but does my colleague believe that those acts are in accordance with the Constitution?

Mr. PRATT. I have some doubts upon that question. I introduced a resolution this morning, directed to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, instructing them to report their views upon the constitutionality of that legislation which we have been indulging in from the beginning, whereby the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to establish post-offices has been delegated to the Postmaster-General. I am constrained to concur with my colleague in the view that he is taking upon that question. I do not discover, on reading the Constitution, how that power can be delegated in either case. The power is given in the same terms to Congress to establish post-offices that it is given to establish post-roads. If Congress must establish post-roads they must establish post-offices, and the power cannot be delegated.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am glad that my colleague concurs in the view that I was taking in regard to this power. It is a legislative power that cannot be transferred or delegated. I was just presenting the point of an attempt on our part to delegate the power to the Secretary of War to levy taxes. We have just as much power to authorize him to determine what articles shall be taxed, as we have to delegate the power to the Postmaster-General to say what shall be a post-road, or the road upon which the mails shall be carried, for that is the essence of making it a post-road. To talk about a road being a post-road upon which the mail is not carried, is mere nonsense. It is the carrying of the mail that makes it a post-road; and when we leave that whole matter to the Postmaster-General, we have left to him the whole substance of the power.

Let me take another legislative power. Congress, says the Constitution, shall have power to declare war. Can we authorize the Secretary of War to declare war whenever he thinks it proper? We have just as much power to authorize the Secretary of War to declare war when in his judgment we should make war, as we have to authorize the Postmaster-General to carry the mail upon a road whenever he thinks it is proper, not when we think it is proper.

I might run through the whole list of these legislative powers, some eighteen of them, that are in the Constitution expressly referred to and defined. Not only is it clearly unconstitutional, but the delegation of this power under the circumstances is dangerous. It is one of the greatest powers conferred upon Congress, and the delegation of it is a source, I doubt not, of the greatest corruption. Not that I mean to cast the slightest imputation upon the present officers of the Post-Office Department. I doubt not that they intend to do their duty; but the abuse is a hoary one, and it is constantly growing in magnitude. How is it? Congress is required to select a road on which the mail shall be carried, and every time a selection of that kind is made it is in the nature of an appropriation; it involves a large sum of money, and the expense of the postal service has now grown to about $36,000,000—double, or nearly double, what it was in 1866, as I am told.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator is certainly mistaken in saying thirty-six millions. The receipts are about $23,000,000, and the appropriation out of the national Treasury five or six millions.

Mr. MORTON. I was governed by what I heard the Senator from Maine state.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the Senator from Minnesota controvert the statement?

Mr. MORTON. He does.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The expenditures contemplated for next year are about $36,000,000.

Mr. RAMSEY. Does the Senator say thirty-six millions?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I say so. I say now that the expenditures contemplated for the postal service for the year ending June 30, 1875, are over $36,000,000. That was my statement the other day.

Mr. RAMSEY. I was speaking of the present expenditures.

Mr. MORTON. I was remarking that every time the Postmaster-General put service upon a road, that is in the nature of an appropriation; it involves an expenditure of $5,000, $10,000, $50,000, or $100,000, and the propriety of that expenditure is left entirely to a single officer. There is no officer of this Government clothed with such power; nothing that approaches it. And how must it be exercised? How does the amendment of my friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] propose that it shall be exercised? We make every mud road in the United States a post-road, and then provide that the Postmaster-General may put service on or not as he chooses, and direct him to send out a special agent of the Post-Office Department to see if service should go on upon it. I ask if there were ever such inducements and opportunities for fraud and corruption? The agent is sent out; he comes across a man who wants to carry the mail. It is a profitable business; he is not getting a very large salary himself; and you expose him to temptation, and you virtually vest in a special agent of the Post-Office Department the decision of a question that the Constitution has reposed in Congress. This man comes back from a distant State or Territory and he says, "The mail ought to be carried upon such a route;" or some clerk in the Post-Office Department determines the same question; parties who want to carry the mail visit him and they persuade a clerk; they may persuade him by logic or they may persuade him in some other way, to send in a report to the Postmaster-General that the mail ought to be carried upon a particular route. The Postmaster-General has not the time to examine all these things; his duties are multitudinous, and the result is that the determination of this question is virtually allotted to a clerk or to a special agent. I have no doubt that the mail is to-day carried upon hundreds and hundreds of routes where it ought not to be carried, and where it is a mere fraud on the Government, where Congress would never authorize it to be carried if the subject had been investigated by a proper committee. I do not now refer to the mail-routes in the Territories. I agree with some Senators who spoke here that so far as they are concerned, we cannot refuse to carry the mail through a distant State or Territory because it does not pay. A small settlement in the Rocky Mountains has a right to have some sort of mail facilities, and we are bound to pay for them; but the abuses I believe come from the thickly settled States where the mail service is doubled and where mail-routes are multiplied side by side. There is where most of these abuses come from—not from the distant Territories and States. But the point I am making is, that we present the greatest temptation to corruption and abuse by leaving to a clerk in the Post-Office Department, or to the head of a Bureau, or to a special agent sent out, the determination of a question which may involve the expenditure of $10,000, $20,000, or $100,000, when it was the purpose of the Constitution that that thing should be determined only by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I would suggest to the Senator that practically it is ascertained that you have to make changes frequently, particularly through the Territories. There communities grow up where they suppose they have mining or some other interest which will attract people there for the time being, and again they disappear. The settlements are disappearing and changing, so that practically it would be impossible for Congress to supervise it. There must be some person to ascertain the facts. You could not have legislation by Congress in all these cases. There must be some machinery whereby the thing can be provided for. I do not think declaring all roads mail-routes will augment the evil at all, or have any tendency in that direction, because it is no trouble now to get a mail-route if application is made. All they have to do is to hand in the name of the route wanted. It seems to me that the thing to do is to provide some more thorough organization to ascertain all the facts. I know of a great deal of abuse in the line the Senator speaks of.

Mr. MORTON. I submit it can be done by Congress, with all deference to my friend, and it ought to be done by Congress, because the Constitution requires that it shall be done by Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the Senator mean to say that the mere ministerial or executive duty of putting service on a particular route has to be done by Congress?

Mr. MORTON. No; I mean to say that the powers of Congress must be finally executed by ministerial officers. But I do say that the determination as to whether the mail shall be carried upon a particular road or not is vested in Congress and nowhere else, and after we have determined that it shall be carried, then the execution of the order is to be left to the Department.

Mr. STEWART. Where you have to drop routes frequently, it would take the whole time of Congress. It is impracticable and out of the question.

Mr. MORTON. There may be cases where a route has to be dropped, but the routes do not have to be changed more than once a year, I take it. Congress meets once a year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would not follow, if I may suggest to my friend, that because the action of Congress was necessary to establish a route, that it could not authorize the Postmaster-General to drop one in a certain contingency. Similar examples have occurred in the history of the Government on that question, so that that point cannot be maintained.

Mr. MORTON. We might vest the Postmaster-General with power to cease to carry the mail in a particular case, but what I insist on is that the power of determining whether a road shall be a mail-route, and putting the mail upon it, has, by the Constitution, been placed in Congress, and it cannot be delegated, and that to authorize it to be delegated in the way that has been done is to open the greatest sources of corruption.

I wish to say one thing further, and I want the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMSEY.] The Senator one day last week read an extract from the postal code giving to the Postmaster-General the power to determine the frequency with which the mail should be carried. He read that as if it gave the Postmaster-General the power to determine whether the mail should be carried on any road or not.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is the intent of it, undoubtedly.

Mr. MORTON. No. I should like the Senator to read that, because I think that is not the intent of it; and such a practice is an express violation of the law.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is chapter 6, and it generalizes all the law on the subject of these post-routes. In the two hundred and fifteenth section of that chapter it is provided:

> The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law.

They are not carried at all until he provides for it.

> The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

In the sense of "whenever," undoubtedly, the words "as often as" are used.

Mr. MORTON. Now I ask the Senator this question: Is this all the law that gives the Postmaster-General a discretion as to whether the mail shall be carried or not?

Mr. RAMSEY. The other check upon his discretion is the amount of the appropriation for transportation.

Mr. MORTON. Now, I submit that this does not give him any discretion at all except as to the frequency, but requires him to put the mail on every road that is made a post-road by Congress. It is "that the Postmaster-General shall"—not "may"—"shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law." Now, my colleague proposes to make every dirt road, township, county, neighborhood road, a post-road. And he shall provide for carrying it "as often"—that is where the discretion comes in—"as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper." The law requires the Postmaster-General to put the mail upon every road that is made a post-road. He may determine the question whether it shall be carried once a week, every day, or twice a day; but he shall put the mail upon the road, and if he does not do it, he violates the law as it stands. If there is any other construction to be given to the law, I should like to know what it is. It reposes no discretion except as to the frequency.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the interpretation of the honorable Senator, that the Postmaster-General may two, three, or four times place service on a route; that he may continue from time to time to put service on a route? It refers to the routes before made post-routes, and the term "as often as" is used in the sense of "whenever."

Mr. MORTON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. "As often as" does not mean "whenever."

Mr. RAMSEY. That has been the practice from the very beginning of the Government.

Mr. MORTON. That may be the practice, but it is clearly not the meaning of the law. The language is, "The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law as often as." That has no reference to the frequency. We know that upon some roads the mail is carried once a day, upon some three times a day, upon others once a week, upon others once in two weeks.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator certainly knows that not over 20 per cent., as has been said here several times, of the routes authorized by law have service even placed upon them. He will find, for instance—and that is an answer to the exaggerated representations made here—that notwithstanding the post-routes created by law during the year 1873–'74 probably amounted to five or ten thousand miles in extent, but twelve hundred miles have had service placed upon them, and that is the usual proportion every year. In addition to that, you have the limit of the appropriation for transportation, which the Postmaster-General cannot exceed. So that there is no reason for all this apprehension and fright about the postal service.

Mr. MORTON. That is a very curious way to construe a law, by saying it has been violated. That is the argument. I say the law does require the mail to be put upon every post-road, and leaves to the Postmaster-General the determination of the question as to how often it shall be carried, but no other discretion. That he has exercised that discretion, and that others who have gone before him have exercised it, I do not dispute; and I am not finding fault, for I believe he has simply followed the practice of the Department for many years. But I say that this law does not leave him any discretion on the subject, nor should the law leave him any discretion on the subject. We should make no road a post-route that we do not intend to have the mail carried on. We may leave to him the determination of the question how often it shall be carried, as the law that has been read does, but not the determination of the main question; because to do that is to vest him with a power that the Constitution placed in Congress.

Mr. RAMSEY. Does the Senator then hold that as soon as you pass the post-route bill, inevitably the Postmaster-General must place service upon every route?

Mr. MORTON. That is just what the law says.

Mr. RAMSEY. All the contemporaneous action of the Government from the enactment of your Constitution and laws down to this time has been otherwise.

Mr. MORTON. That may be. I cannot help that. I am not responsible for that. I am only speaking about the law, as it is clearly unmistakable.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I really hope the Senate will not adopt this amendment. I think it would be most disastrous. I am not going into the constitutional argument that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has raised. I base my objection to the amendment upon the inequality of the thing and the absolute wrong that it will work.

I think we ought to co-operate with the various Departments of our Government here in everything that is right. We ought to strengthen them where we can; we ought to relieve them from responsibility where we can; and now to open every cow-path in all this broad land and make it, if you can by law, a mail-route, would make the duties of the Post-Office Department impracticable, impossible of execution. How could it resist the applications that would be made upon it, and where would it end, and what uncounted millions of dollars would be demanded of us to pay for the service? If you have got a statute that says the Postmaster-General shall put service upon every post-road, and you make every common highway in all the land a post-road, there will be no end to the expenditures that would be required, and there would be an embarrassment in the Department that no mind, however strong, could stand under.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. We have from the beginning established post-roads to the number of between fifteen and twenty thousand. The bill pending before the Senate with the amendments ingrafted upon it adds to that number some three or four hundred more. Now, the question I desire to put to the Senator from Maine is, if he knows, if any member of this body knows, how many of the roads embraced in this present bill, or in past bills of a like character, are cow-paths, as he styles them? Does he know anything about the amount of travel upon the highways that are embraced in this present bill? Does he know whether within a quarter of a century to come the settlement of the country will demand that the mail service shall be put upon these routes? Does anybody know that fact?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir; we do not know; but as the wants of the country shall develop themselves, and as the necessities shall occur, the Senator will certainly find me here voting liberally for the extension of the mail service, but not so liberally as this amendment proposes.

I used the term "cow-path." I mean precisely what I say; because in some sections of this country roads that are legally authorized, legally established, laid out, and proper records thereof duly made, are for a period of time little better, in their early days, than cow-paths. But I will qualify it and say, suppose you take every well-made and usually traveled road and constitute all such roads mail-routes, I insist that you would open up such a vast field of mail-routes and you would make such an extensive demand upon the Postmaster-General for service, that, with all the protection that special agents might afford, you would impose a duty upon him which he could not sustain. You would demand an expenditure that would beggar your Treasury. The thing is impracticable. Why, sir, it is letting loose everything without restriction.

I insist, and have insisted, with my colleague, that there is not care enough in framing your post-route bills. I know well—I have said, and I repeat it—that we must take care of the frontier settlements; and I will go as far in that direction as any man in this Senate; but I do not want to see all restrictions removed. I think before we establish a post-route anywhere that a Senator should give us some knowledge, himself, of its usefulness, or there should be some petition, accompanied by a statement from somebody, who has information, showing the necessity for the route. How easy it would be—I do not know how much it would be worth, but it would be worth something—if you could have the certificate of the postmasters in the vicinity where a post-route is asked, stating the distance, the number of population, that it would accommodate, and the probable expense of a weekly, semi-weekly, or tri-weekly mail. We should be aided somewhat in our action here if we were furnished with such information; but to open up all this broad field it does seem to me will not commend itself to the good judgment of the Senate; and it is for that reason, without stopping to inquire into the constitutional argument that my friend from Indiana has raised, that I shall vote against this amendment, and I do hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I concur in all that has been said by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] To my mind it is quite clear that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the representatives of the people, coming from the people, in the interests of the people, knowing their wants and their wishes, should regulate the establishment of post-routes.

What would be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] were it adopted? I can say what the effect of it would be in my State. It would amount simply to this, that instead of the judgment of seven representatives scattered over the State, familiar with the State and with the wishes and wants of the people, being taken into consideration, we should have to rely upon the judgment of one single special agent of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. More than one.

Mr. CLAYTON. Upon one special agent, perhaps accompanied by a clerk. Until lately we have had no special agent at all in my State.

Now, to my mind it is very clear that if we adopt this proposition it will either lead to neglect of this very important interest, especially in sparsely populated regions of country, or it will involve a great deal of expense in having the necessary investigations made. I hope it will not be adopted. Independent of all questions of constitutionality, on the mere question of expediency I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I agree with the Senator from Indiana on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. MORTON,] in being opposed to this amendment of his colleague, [Mr. PRATT,] but not for the reasons which he gives. I understand the Constitution to require that Congress shall establish post-offices and post-roads. That is, in a measure, an exercise of sovereignty—an exercise of eminent domain. Sovereign government says that a turnpike, or bridge over the Mississippi, or any road shall be devoted to this public service. Congress having done that has fulfilled its obligations. The mere police regulation as to when it is proper to have a mail run over that route is left properly to the executive department of the Government; and it seems to me that the true interpretation of the act which has been commented upon is "whenever" for "as often as." I read it in this wise: "That the Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper."

Here a mail-route is established. The Postmaster-General inquires what is the number of inhabitants to be accommodated, what the demands of the route are, and says, "The time has not come when the productiveness and the other circumstances require a mail to be established, and I will not establish it at all;" and by determining that he will not establish it at all, he determines that it is done "as often as" it ought to be. At some subsequent time he may think that it is proper to establish a mail service on that route. I think that Congress ought to be liberal in establishing these routes. Why, sir, the object of government is the accommodation of the people; and even if a route does not pay, the Government gets its compensation in the increase of the value of the land, in the increase of taxes, and in making the objects of government subserve their purpose.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the first branch of the amendment which I have offered provides that "all bridges heretofore or hereafter to be erected over the navigable rivers of the United States, or over lakes or the outlet of lakes, or arms of the sea, or other bodies of water, shall be, and the same are hereby, established post-roads." Now, in the light of our past legislation, what earthly reasonable objection can be urged against this portion of the amendment which I have offered? As I had occasion to observe to the Senate the other day, we have at various times, in fifty separate legislative enactments, declared that this bridge, and that bridge, and the other bridge, which had been constructed or was in process of being constructed over some river, or arm of the sea, or outlet of a lake, should be a post-road. I have before me in the revision of the laws an enumeration of fifty bridges that have been at different times established by separate acts of Congress as post-roads. Let me enumerate some of them: The bridge across the Ohio River, at Wheeling in West Virginia, and at Bridgeport, in Ohio; the bridge constructed at Steubenville, in Ohio, abutting on the Virginia shore of the Ohio River; the bridge erected by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company and the Jeffersonville Railroad Company across the Ohio River at the head of the Falls of the Ohio, and so going on until there is an enumeration of fifty bridges that at different times have been erected into post-roads.

Now, is it to be presumed that when a bridge shall hereafter be built over any of the streams enumerated or any other navigable waters of the United States Congress will hesitate, upon application, to establish the bridge as a post-road? Why not then, sir, by a general enactment like the first branch of the amendment which I have offered declare that all bridges hereafter to be erected, as well as those heretofore erected, over navigable rivers, &c., shall be post-roads?

Now, as to the latter branch of the amendment, which has provoked most opposition, I desire to submit a few observations in support of that. The Senate has been informed repeatedly by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads—and what he does not know about the subject is not worth knowing—that not more than 20 or 25 per cent. of the post-roads that are established by Congress from time to time are actually employed in the transportation of the mail over them. In other words, under the discretionary power which has been conferred by Congress upon the Postmaster-General he does not as a matter of course cause the mail to be transported over every post-road established by authority of Congress. He informs himself of the necessity of the mail service over the road; first, whether the wants of the community in that part of the country demand it; and next, as to the productiveness to the Post-Office Department after the mail service shall have been placed upon it; so that, of the number of roads established from time to time, by authority of Congress as post-roads, amounting to between fifteen and twenty thousand, there are only to-day, all enumerated, less than eight thousand post-roads that are actually in operation. And in making that statement I embrace all railroad-routes, all steamboat-routes, all routes by canals and by plank roads, as well as the common dirt roads of the country.

Now, why not accomplish this thing by general enactment in the language of the amendment I offer, as well as to go on from session to session and, as a matter of course, upon the proposition of this Senator and that, erect this dirt road and that dirt road into a post-road? Nobody questions my friend from Michigan when he offers an amendment to this bill as to whether the road he suggests is necessary for a post-road or not; whether there is a sufficient settlement along the line of the road to justify the Postmaster-General in putting the mail upon it. No one questions my friend from Alabama, who, in an old-settled State, a State that is nearly as old as the State of Indiana, has between thirty and forty new post-roads by this bill established in the State of Alabama. No one questions him about the necessity of these roads. And so the thing goes on from session to session, and goes on as a matter of course. My friend, the chairman of the committee, is too polite a man entirely to ask me whether a post-road which I propose is necessary in the State of Indiana. When I offer a little amendment he takes it as a matter of course and incorporates it in his bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. It does the Senator no good, though, unless the Postmaster-General places service upon it; so I can afford to be very kind.

Mr. PRATT. Of course; and so when we have established every city, county, township, and neighborhood road in the United States a post-road, the same result will follow: the Postmaster-General, in the exercise of his authority, will put the mail service on these roads only as and when the occasion demands it.

Now, then, sir, to repeat myself, if we may legitimately declare that every railroad in the country shall be a post-road, why not declare that every dirt road in the country established by competent authority shall be a post-road? If we may declare that all the canals in the United States shall be post-roads, why not all the navigable waters of the United States. We have done that; and all the streets in fifty-two cities where the free-delivery system prevails are by solemn enactment declared post-roads. Now, I cannot see in the face of all this legislation any special harm that is going to ensue from my amendment. It hurts nobody; it is not going to increase the mail service; it is not going to increase the expenditures of the Post-Office Department. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I am rather glad that the attention of the Senate has been called to this subject; because, whatever the legislation may be, we are likely to get some understanding of the character of the mail service of the country, and if there is any service in the country that is left at the discretion of a Department in a most extraordinary way, it seems to me this is that particular service; and perhaps the discretion in the Department is not as extraordinary as the character of the legislation itself. The most extraordinary thing is that Congress should ever have been led into this loose and irregular and utterly indefensible method of exercising its prerogatives.

Sir, one thing is certainly clear: there is no power, save what resides in Congress, to establish either a post-road or a post-office. Nobody will deny that. The power is here; nowhere else. It is said that it cannot be delegated. I agree to that; but it is said that it is very difficult to exercise this trust if we do not delegate it. I deny that; or, in other words, I submit that that is not at all probable. I am not sufficiently well informed of the character of the postal service to be very certain about that; but by analogy I feel no hesitation in saying that I cannot conceive that there is any difficulty in Congress exercising the discretion in every instance as to whether a mail service should be put upon a particular route. We know the topography and geography of this country; we know it by the maps, we know it by history, we know it in every way generally, and we know it particularly in all its details and ramifications—roads, streets, rivers, wherever a service might be deemed to be practicable at all—through the Representatives of the people themselves; and if a mail service is necessary in any part of this widely extended and greatly diversified country, through the Representatives particularly acting in harmony with the Senators, it can be known, and understood, and communicated to the proper committee on that service in this branch or in the other that in this particular place, from this point to another, mail service is required. I submit that in exercising the duty, which devolves on us alone, of establishing a post-road, there is no difficulty at all in Congress exercising its judgment whether that thing is necessary or not. Therefore it need not be left to the Postmaster-General or to anybody else.

It is clear, in contemplation of the Constitution, that no route is to be established except upon this judgment of Congress; and it is as clear, both as an inference of law from the constitutional provision and the logic of the thing, as well as the public service itself, that no post-road was to be made except in harmony with the public convenience and public demand; and if the service, being authorized service, was to be run on it, it was not to be the discretion of the Postmaster-General whether service should be put on or not; nor do I think it is so left by the law which has been read by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. Congress establishes the road. That fixes the service. That there shall be a service on that road, in the fair contemplation of the Constitution, is no longer a question of discretion anywhere. It is the duty of the Postmaster-General to put it on by any fair implication—I do not say by the practice—but by any fair implication of the Constitution and our duties here; the road being established, the service follows as a matter of course; and that provision of law which has been read in our hearing only relates to the frequency with which the service shall be run, and that is to depend upon the discretion of the Postmaster-General. The road having been established, service having to be put upon it, the frequency with which it shall be done depends on the discretion of the Postmaster-General as to the necessity and demand for a particular kind of service; but that a service is to be put upon the road follows from the fact that Congress has adjudged it to be necessary; the question of frequency, simply, is left to the Postmaster-General.

Now, Mr. President, to illustrate the absurdity of this sort of legislation, just consider one fact which my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] brought out the other day, and has repeated again to-day, and that is, that 20 or 25 per cent. only of the post-roads which Congress has solemnly established have had mail service put upon them. Can anybody think of anything more absurd than that? It is said that there is no danger, no difficulty about this, or at any rate that there need be no alarm. Our honorable friend, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. RAMSEY,] says that nobody need have alarm about this; we have run on, and ran pretty glib, and so far as anybody knows he believes we have run very well. That may be; but I take occasion to remind that honorable Senator that in this way of running we have run up, since 1866, from $15,000,000 to between thirty-six and thirty-seven million dollars of annual expenditure.

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend allow me a moment? I know that he is generally accurate; but I wish to call his attention to the fact that from that calculation, 25 per cent. of mail service on the routes established, you have to deduct all railroad routes. Furthermore you have to take into the calculation the fact that new routes are made, running through perhaps shorter distances between given points, requiring old and circuitous routes once declared mail routes to be abandoned. Therefore by this process, I would call his attention to the fact that the statement is not extraordinary and is not alarming.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not looking at it in that light.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am surprised at the extraordinary pertinacity with which a Senator occupying the position of chairman of so eminent a committee as that of the Senator from Maine should persist in wronging a great Department of the Government. He persists in saying that the expenditures are $36,000,000. Why, sir, here is a statement that the receipts were twenty-two millions and the expenditures twenty-nine millions. What they may be in 1875 or in 1883 we certainly cannot tell. That is the estimate, it is true. They will doubtless keep pace with the growth of the country. But that the Department should now be condemned for what it is going to do next year I cannot see the force of.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator says he cannot tell what the expense will be for the next year. That is precisely what the Senator is commenting upon and reading from. The Senator comes at me and says that it is impossible to tell what the expenses for 1875 are to be. But that is precisely the estimate from which the honorable Senator reads, and that is what I am talking about.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am reading what the expenditures have been in the past year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; the Senator is reading, if he will look, from estimates of receipts and expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1875.

Mr. RAMSEY. "The ordinary revenues of this Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873"—that is all that is certain, that is past—"were $22,966,000, and expenditures of all kinds were $29,000,000."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Has the Senator the report of the Postmaster-General for this year in his hand?

Mr. RAMSEY. That is the report I am reading from.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If he has that he will find in it the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for that year the Postmaster-General estimates that the earnings will be $20,000,000, and that there will be a deficiency of $7,000,000, and odd, making over $36,000,000. Does he not find that? If he does, then he will see that it is not a difficult thing to tell, in the way we are running on, what the expenditures are to be for 1875.

I agree with what my honorable friend from California says, that the fact which has been stated by my friend from Indiana to which I adverted is not alarming in a practical sense. I did not refer to it in that light. I referred to it to illustrate the absurdity of what we are doing, the absurdity of this kind of legislation, and as an illustration I think of the entire practicability of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, telling us precisely what this service ought to be. There is no difficulty about it; there is no intricacy about it.

Why, Mr. President, how long would this Government run if the Treasury and the other Departments were conducted in the same way? Is there any other branch of the public service over which the Congress of the United States does not have a general supervision as to its expenditures? But here, sir, is a branch of the Government over which you have no control whatever; all is in the hands of the Department itself, under a discretion which we by our indiscreet legislation have put in its power. I am not assailing the Department; I am only speaking of the system, and I am speaking of a system which we ourselves are responsible for.

Now, Mr. President, here are revenues to the amount of twenty-nine millions for the next fiscal year, as estimated, and here is a deficit of seven millions, making the expenditures of that Department between thirty-six and thirty-seven million dollars. What do we know about it? Can the honorable Senator who is chairman of this committee tell anything about these expenditures in detail? Very little. It is not his fault, but the fault of the system. Not a dollar of this thirty-seven millions ever goes through the Treasury of the United States, or is subjected to its audit or control. Is not that an anomaly in our history? Is not that a most extraordinary method of making expenditure to that amount? It is like the Patent Office was some years ago. The Patent Office was once run in this way. It was supposed that the service was of that special and peculiar kind that it was impracticable for us to cover the receipts into the Treasury and pay out its expenses in the proper way. It run so for many years; but they were covered in at last, and they flowed into the Treasury as they came into the Department, and went out on warrants for payment like other expenditures in other Departments. But here is a Department standing by itself, independent of the Treasury, and independent of its control in its expenditures to this large amount, depending entirely upon a discretion which we in this most extraordinary way have conferred upon it. I do not think that is a proper thing at all. I am not arraigning the Department; I am not saying that the Postmaster-General is not efficient, that he is not doing his duty in a proper way under the law, and under the system which we have made; but I do submit that if we would have this institution efficient, and if we would keep it within its reasonable bounds so that it will not break itself down, we must arrest this kind of legislation. That is my belief about it.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment proposed by my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] will not be put upon this bill. I do not believe there is the slightest necessity for it. I agree with my honorable friend from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] that the discretion for the establishment of a post-office or a post-road is a great deal safer in the hands of the representatives of the people than it possibly can be anywhere else, and that there is not the slightest difficulty in the world in informing a committee of this body whether a postal service in any part of this country is necessary or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I thought the Senator from Indiana accepted that amendment.

Mr. PRATT. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana as modified.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to have the entire amendment as it now stands read before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The entire amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, reads:

That all bridges heretofore, or hereafter to be, erected over the navigable rivers of the United States, or over the lakes or outlets of lakes, or over arms of the sea, or other bodies of water, and all public roads established or hereafter to be established in the States or Territories by competent authority and used as public highways, leading from one town to another, or from one village to another, or from any railroad depot to any town or village, be, and the same are hereby, established post-roads: Provided, That no service shall hereafter be ordered on the routes herein or hereafter established until after an examination and report of an agent of the Post-Office Department, and where in the judgment of the Postmaster-General such service is demanded by the public convenience and necessity.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following as an additional section:

That after the 30th day of June, 1874, conveyance in the mails of samples of merchandise, packages of clothing, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, samples of metals, ores, and mineralogical specimens, and bound books, shall cease; and all laws authorizing such conveyance are hereby repealed, said repeal to take effect at that date.

Mr. President, in the few remarks which I submitted the other day I endeavored to call to the attention of the Senate the great increase of the amount of mails, the difficulty there is in distributing them and carrying them from one part of the country to another under our present postal-car system, and the very great and rapid increase of the cost of the whole mail service, and I suggested to the Senate that it seemed to me the best remedy for some of the evils which we suffer under at the present time, and which are being aggravated month by month, would be cutting out from the articles allowed to be carried by mail everything in the nature of merchandise, and making the mail service what I think it was intended to be originally, simply a medium for the transmission of intelligence—not an opposition to the express companies, not an express company in itself, but simply an agency used by the Government for the circulation of letters, of newspapers, of circulars, of matter which is intelligent in its nature. I sought to show that there was no occasion whatever in the business of the country for carrying merchandise in the mails, carrying clothing and articles of a miscellaneous nature which do not require rapid transmission, or if they do can be carried by express companies at adequate rates.

Now, sir, if any one will go to the dead-letter office and see the packages which are sometimes stranded in that institution he will be astonished at the multifarious uses to which the mail is at present put. For instance, he will find there, among other things, bee-hives, with live bees in them, fed with their honey and sheltered by glass. He will find the most incongruous articles which are sent through the mails under our provision that everything, except some dangerous liquids, can be sent through them if not weighing over four pounds. These articles, bulky and weighty, fill up the postal mail-cars and are carried by our present system like the letter which must go as rapidly as possible, upon the fastest trains, with postal clerks, and large numbers of them, upon the trains to see to their immediate distribution; and the effect is that all the accommodations which the Postmaster-General can get upon the postal-car system are not sufficient for the adequate and rapid and satisfactory distribution of the matter which ought to pass through the mails alone.

The Postmaster-General in a recent report which he sent to us, in reply to a resolution of the Senate——

Mr. HAMLIN. Will my friend allow me to suggest that if Senators will go to the Post-Office Department they will find some beautiful specimens of crocodiles transmitted through the mails, and they will find some excellent specimens of snakes that are there. I want the Senator to add these to the illustration he gives.

Mr. SARGENT. I do so with great pleasure. I doubt if any one can show why crocodiles and snakes, especially if alive, should be sent through the mails. Certainly such things, if necessary to be sent at all, should be sent through the expresses.

But before calling attention to the figures which the Postmaster-General gives, showing the tremendous increase of weight of the mails and the difficulty of providing for their transmission, I wish to say that I have included in this amendment, as may be observed, bound books. Bound books, as I remarked the other day, and I now repeat briefly, are not of that nature of intelligence, though, as we all know, greatly valuable in themselves, to require immediate or rapid transmission. They are the product of slow-maturing thought; they are printed leisurely; the proofs are read at leisure; they are struck off from the press; they are ordered in smaller or greater quantities, and there is no haste for their rapid distribution. They simply supply a demand of trade; they fill a demand of the country, but they do it in a more slow and methodical manner; and, therefore, after some consideration, I have concluded that this branch of merchandise should be put upon the same footing as other kinds, and that the mails ought not to be burdened with it.

The Postmaster-General, in the document I hold in my hand, (Senate Executive Document 22 of this session,) says:

So rapid is the increase of postal business that the through lines are taxed to their utmost capacity to convey the letter correspondence and paper matter dispatched from the commercial and publishing centers of the country. From a careful computation of the quantities of mail-matter disposed of in the New York City post-office, there appears a daily average of 624,275 letters handled, and 1,416 bags of letter and paper mails received and dispatched, the whole weighing 131,286 pounds, or 58.6 tons.

Senators who reflect for a moment will see what an enormous mass this is to handle daily, and from that one single city.

This is exclusive of all mails transferred from one railway post-office line to another, at New York, without passing through the city post-office. Fully 75 per cent. of the aggregate amount passes over lines running to and from the West, Northwest, and Southwest. By one of the great railway post-office lines leading to the Northwest, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, receiving New York mails from the New York Central Railroad at Buffalo, and from the Erie Railway at Buffalo and Dunkirk, there were delivered at Chicago, during the month of November last, 536,113 pounds of mail, an average of nearly 18,000 pounds per day, after discharging large quantities of matter at Cleveland for the State of Ohio, and at Toledo for Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Texas, Colorado, New Mexico, the Indian Territory, and portions of Indiana and Illinois. It is estimated that on this line the average daily distribution of letters by railway post-office clerks is 50,000 on each westward and 25,000 on each eastward trip, making in all for the two trips, each way, 150,000 letters per day. The great bulk of the matter going West, however, consists of paper-mails, which require to be distributed while in transit, as well as the letters. They are so distributed, and are transferred, with the letter-mails, directly to the depots of connecting roads. These mails have outgrown the facilities for handling them; so that at times, despite the utmost effort, they cannot be all distributed on the trains, and consequent delay occurs. The above figures, indicating the amount of business in the New York City post-office, and on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway post-office line, it will be proper to note, are averages. There are many days when they are largely exceeded, and promptness and accuracy of delivery cannot be secured unless the facilities for the service shall be equal to the demands of these exceptional days.

That being the great pressure on the ordinary letter and newspaper mails, both of which must be carried with celerity and dispatch, I ask Senators if it is not about time that we repeal the privileges which we have given heretofore, and which perhaps were proper when the carrying of the mail was a small service, for carrying merchandise of any kind whatever that is put in the mail; and for this purpose, believing it to be a practical reform, I have proposed this amendment, and it seems to me that the earlier we do it the better. I hope, therefore, it will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say to my honorable friend from California that in a conversation the other day with the Postmaster-General on this very subject I learned from him that he has from the beginning been opposed to loading the mails with this dead weight, this matter which is simply the subject of freight and not the subject of postal service; and therefore I feel entirely at liberty to say that I understand that this amendment would be (though it was not contemplated by me at the time) in harmony with the judgment of the head of the Post-Office Department. That it is a fit thing in itself I think is obvious from a simple statement in regard to what the postal service is of itself. The prime object of the postal service is of course to carry intelligence, to promote intercommunication by carrying communications between persons, at first letters, afterward newspapers, subsequently pamphlets, and books possibly. Now, the primary object has become subordinated to the incongruity of connecting with it a system of freights, of dead weight having no relation whatever to the legitimate service contemplated by the Constitution, the result of which has been, as my friend from California has stated, that it has overwhelmed the postal service proper, and in many ways that service is literally borne down; and the immense expenditures which have been increasing in the last few years, to which I have adverted once or twice before, I attribute in a very great measure to this principal fact.

I do not think that a more radical reform and a more obviously necessary reform in any branch of the public service could be made than the one contemplated by this amendment of my honorable friend from California; one which, while it would not touch the postal service at any essential point, while it would only take out of it what can just as well travel by the expresses of the country in all directions, would relieve this service of a very great burden, and enable it to extend its usefulness in many directions where, I doubt exceedingly, whether the people of this country would be willing to extend it if we are to connect with the postal service the freight business, and it goes on at the rate to which I have referred this morning.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think that the amendment which prohibits the mails from carrying books is a very objectionable one. The answer is that these books can be sent by express. Well, the express does not reach a great many places and a great many localities where the mail does reach; and it would be a great deprivation to people living in parts of the country where there is no express to take from them this mail facility; and my objection is that the only parties who would gain by it would be the railroad companies. The contract which the post-office would make with them would be at no less a rate, but they would only perform less service for the pay which they get.

Mr. SARGENT. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator, I think, must be aware that the railroad companies now are paid by weight for the exact amount they carry; and if we take off one-quarter of the amount which they do carry, they receive one-quarter less, which I suppose will be about the amount of merchandise the mail will be relieved from. So it cannot be an advantage to the railroads.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The contracts which are made by the Post-Office Department are made for four years, those for one-quarter of the country being made each year; and consequently on more than half of the post-routes there is a contract which will exist for two years.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me again. I wish to remind my friend, and the chairman of the Post-Office Committee who sits beside him, that the mail service is done without contract, and at the last session we passed a law authorizing the Postmaster-General to send the mails on the railroads without making a contract, because the railroad companies refused to make such contracts, and the railway postal service consequently is done without any contract, and may be terminated at any time by the Postmaster-General. Furthermore, the law which I refer to is now operating, and the matter was weighed last October, and may be weighed in any month that the Postmaster-General sees fit, and the amount of payment made proportionate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The general law for carrying the mails is by contract. There was an exceptional case where the railroad companies refused to make a contract, and then from necessity and temporarily the plan mentioned by the Senator was resorted to.

Now I do not believe that the Postmaster-General desires this amendment. I know very well that within a week he has told me himself that he contemplated reducing, I think he said one-half, the rate of postage on bound books, for the very purpose of affording the facility of having this information carried to remote parts of the country. At all events, we know that here is a radical reform that the Postmaster-General (who is a sufficient reformer in reference to carrying the mails, I think, to satisfy us all) has not recommended to Congress at all.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to make an appeal to the Senator from California to withdraw his amendment at this time. The practice of the Senate has been, for many years, to refuse to place any general legislation on the post-route bill. I hope the Senator will recognize that, and, at some other time, introduce a separate bill for this purpose.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall withdraw the amendment: but I wish to make one remark before doing so, and that is, that before submitting this amendment I had a conversation with the Postmaster-General upon it, and I know he is in favor of it—in favor of making the mail a medium simply of transmitting intelligence; and, furthermore, if Senators will look at page 7 of the document I read from before, they will find a very perceptible sneer on his part against this system of "improved field and garden seeds" going through the mail, and it being made the medium of the general distribution of books. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the Senator does withdraw it, as I am always in favor of any practical reform, I wish to ask the Senator from California, in view of this amendment, under which of these heads he intends to correct the abuses which he introduced to the Senate by way of illustration. We have a provision in regard to samples, merchandise, packages of clothing, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, samples of metals, ores, mineralogical specimens, and bound books. Now under which of these will you prohibit snakes and alligators?

Mr. SARGENT. "General merchandise." [Laughter.] If snakes and alligators are not general merchandise I do not know how otherwise to classify them.

Mr. SCOTT. That is an extension of the term "merchandise" that I never have heard before.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it is a prostitution of the mails.

I withdraw the amendment, hoping that the subject will be called to the attention of the Post-Office Committee, and that we shall have it in some other shape by and by.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to amend an amendment of my own by inserting after the word "Camden" the words "via Rosston."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. I offer an amendment to the bill on page 6, after line 126, to insert the words—

From Montrose, Lee County, Iowa, by way of Nauvoo, Hancock County, Illinois, to Adrian, in the last-mentioned county and State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the conclusion of the bill:

Provided, That no post-offices shall be established upon any of the post-routes herein enumerated by the Postmaster-General until such post-offices are first authorized by Congress.

I cannot add to the very able argument which my colleague submitted to the Senate on this very question. Undoubtedly it seems to me he is correct in his construction of the Constitution. The language is that "Congress shall have power to establish post-offices and post-roads." The two are coupled together. If before mail service can be put upon any road it is necessary to have that road declared a post-road, then it is just as necessary that Congress should determine what offices shall be established upon that road.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not read the Constitution in that way. The Constitution says that "Congress shall have power to coin money." That does not mean that we shall coin money; that means that we shall take the necessary steps to have the money coined at Government mints. It says that "Congress shall have power to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities," &c.; and "shall have the power to establish post-offices and post-roads;" that is, to provide for the establishment of post-offices and post-roads; to take the necessary measures. Again: "Congress shall have the power to promote the progress of sciences and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors," &c.; and so on through. It does not mean that we shall actually go about and establish the post-offices. That is a ministerial duty for the executive department of the Government.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, let us look at the clauses that stand immediately before this power to establish post-offices and post-roads. Here is the power in the fifth specification, "to coin money and regulate the value thereof." Does my friend from New Jersey think we may delegate this power of coining money to some other authority?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think we can coin it.

Mr. PRATT. Does the Senator think we can delegate the power of regulating the value of money to some other authority?

Then, again, in the sixth specification is the power "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States." Is that a power which can be transferred, or must it be exercised by Congress? Then comes the power in question, "to establish post-offices and post-roads." Now, I cite the action of the Government from the beginning. We have been establishing post-routes until we have got upon the statute-book between fifteen and twenty thousand. Nobody ever supposed that the Postmaster-General could put mail service upon any route until it had been first declared a post-road. We do that at every session; we do it now. My proposition is that if Congress must establish under the Constitution the post-road, by the same authority Congress must establish the post-offices to be located upon that road.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, if this amendment is to be adopted the result will be that hereafter it will not be in the power of the Post-Office Department to keep pace with the demands of the settlers of a new country. The great number of post-offices now are established for the benefit of those who go out from our older communities and establish new settlements and produce the necessity for the extension of our post-office system. If they are to come here once every year to ask for these facilities, there are times when you will have communities in all the new States and in all the Territories, for ten months and nine months, or for a year, without facilities; for communities are established and brought together very often within a month where there was no necessity for post-office facilities thirty days before. As fast as they have established their villages and taken up their homes, and organized themselves upon the prairie, far away from post-offices, our present system allows the Postmaster-General to follow them with the benefits and the blessings of our system. He furnishes them post-offices in the months of April, May, and June, and on until we meet again in December; but if they are to wait year by year, and come up here every Congress for us to establish the post-offices ourselves, they will not hereafter be blessed as they have been blessed heretofore with post-office facilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to add by way of amendment some four routes in Missouri, that are made necessary by a railroad which has lately been built in that portion of the State where these routes are intended to be. The great railroad from Saint Louis south to Little Rock and to Texas, has but recently been built, and my amendment connects the county seats of these counties at the very station on this railroad. I move to insert under "Missouri" the following:

From Commerce, via Hamburgh and Benton, to Morley.
From Libertyville to Knob Lick.
From Dexter, via Cotton Hill, Clarkton, Kennet, and Cotton Plant, to Hornersville.
From New Madrid to Sikeston.
From Bloomfield to Castorville.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. I offer the following amendment, to come in under the head of "Tennessee:"

From McKenzie, via Macedonia, Winsett's Mills, and Fount's Store, to Sandy Hill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM L. CABELL.

Mr. GORDON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill to remove the disabilities of Mr. Cabell, of Dallas, Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not yet been reported from the committee to which it was referred.

Mr. GORDON. I think it is not in the hands of a committee. I objected to its reference, and asked for its consideration the other morning.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator from Georgia the floor for a motion on a bill?

Mr. GORDON. My bill, it seems, has been referred to the Judiciary Committee and not reported.

Mr. CONKLING. Hearing Senators around me suggest a motion to adjourn, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 23, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour now begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock. The call of committees for reports of a private nature will proceed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire whether a bill relating to the telegraph line between this Capitol and the Departments would be considered a private bill.

The SPEAKER. It would not; that would be treated as a public bill.

WILLIAM H. VESEY.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William H. Vesey, former consul of the United States at Havre, France, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $1,320.57, being the amount of his loss in consequence of the failure on March 27, 1857, of the house of Green & Co., American bankers, with whom he had deposited moneys belonging to the United States to the amount of $1,467.30, upon the assignment by Vesey to the United States of his claim against the firm for the moneys so deposited.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained; and the bill will be so referred.

CONSULATE AT SAINT MICHAELS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back adversely a petition for the establishment of a consulate at Saint Michaels, the consul to reside at Ponta Belgada; which was laid on the table.

PENELOPE T. HEALD.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to Penelope T. Heald.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point; and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MARGARET EDWARDS.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the petition of Margaret Edwards, for a pension; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM SWANZEY.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 141) granting a pension to William Swanzey.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point. The bill will be so referred.

JAMES S. ELLIOTT.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the petition of James S. Elliott, for arrears of pension and increase of pension; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

EZRA TAYLOR.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely upon the petition of Ezra Taylor, for arrears of pension; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HURLBUT subsequently said: I desire to ask a revocation of the order by which the application of Major Ezra Taylor for arrears of pension was laid on the table, upon the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I ask that the case may be put upon the Private Calendar, to be considered in the Committee of the Whole. It is a case which has great merit.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order requested by the gentleman will be made.

There was no objection.

JOHN A. FISHER.

Mr. WALLACE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I make the point of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

J. S. BONSALLS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the petition of J. S. Bonsalls, relating to a pension for Mrs. Bonsalls; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

EQUALIZATION OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SMALL. The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Patrick Doyle and others, for increase of pensions in case of the loss of an arm or hand, have directed me to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1066) to equalize pensions in certain cases.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this is not a private bill.

Mr. SMALL. The bill is founded upon private petitions.

The SPEAKER. Not being a private bill, it cannot be reported on this call if the point be made against it. It is a public bill, and will be returned to the committee.

JOHN BAKER.

Mr. SMALL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 1403) granting a pension to John Baker; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be so referred.

THOMAS R. HARDWICK.

Mr. SMALL also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 510) granting a pension to Thomas R. Hardwick, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report was ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. KERR.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I will now call up, as the call of committees has been gone through, the West Virginia contested-election case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to introduce, for reference to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, a report from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. KELLOGG. I also wish to make a report.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1404) for the relief of William F. Kerr; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

VICTOR MYLINS.

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1405) for the relief of Victor Mylins, of Macoupin County, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM STODDARD.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 154) for the relief of William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster United States Volunteers, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report was ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the following cases; and the same were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

The case of William Q. Reich, for relief; and

The case of Benjamin Crawford, for relief.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I must insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the resumption of the West Virginia contested-election case.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have several bills to report from the Committee on Claims, and hope I will have permission to do so.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees has been gone through with, and the Chair begs to remind gentlemen that the morning hour begins at twelve o'clock. [Laughter.]

WEST VIRGINIA ELECTION CASES.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolutions, reported from the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, (first,) That Mr. Davis, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, (second,) That Mr. Hagans, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, (third,) That Mr. Wilson, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was elected upon the day lawfully prescribed for the election of Representatives in Congress in the State of West Virginia, and is hereby admitted to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, in the State of West Virginia, in the year 1872, there were two elections for members of Congress, the first on the fourth Thursday of August and the second on the fourth Thursday of October. There are two sets of claimants, who are now asking to be admitted to seats in this Congress, and this House must determine who, if any, of these claimants are entitled to seats. I think it was very well said in the able argument submitted to the Committee on Elections in behalf of the claimants under the October election that—

The right of the respective claimants in this contest for seats in the Forty-third Congress is to be decided wholly by deciding which of the two days, the fourth Thursday of August or the fourth Thursday of October, was the day prescribed by the Legislature for the election of Representatives in Congress.

It is not to be presumed that the State of West Virginia has been left without any law on the subject, if it be possible to construe the laws we find in existence in such manner as to authorize an election. There are laws which in my judgment do authorize an election, and this House is simply to decide which was the proper day for the election, the fourth Thursday of August or the fourth Thursday of October.

I will call the attention of the House to the code of West Virginia, in force up to the fourth Thursday of August, and for many years prior thereto; and upon the provisions of the first and second sections of a chapter of that code, and upon certain provisions made by the constitutional convention in that State, the question is to be determined as to who of these claimants are entitled to their seats.

The first section of the code to which I shall refer provides that—

The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

So far no provision is made for the election of Representatives in Congress. This section provides simply for an election of officers under State authority.

Now, it will be observed that this section of the code provides for two things: first, for an event, a general election of State, district, county, and township officers; and, secondly, it prescribes the time of that event. These two things, then, are fixed in this section of the code, the event and the time prescribed for that event. I presume it will not be doubted but that it was competent in some form to change both the event and the time of the event. This was done in the State of West Virginia by a convention in session in 1871 and 1872, which finally adjourned in March, 1872, and submitted to a vote of the people, to be taken on the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, for ratification or rejection, a new constitution for that State. The twentieth section of the law under which that convention was held made this provision——

Mr. SMITH, of New York. May I interrupt the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I hope the gentleman is not going to depart from the proposition he has made so broadly, that the first section only relates to State officers, without some attempt to prove it. He assumes the point which we dispute, that the term "district officers" includes Representatives in Congress, for whose election provision was made in the act amended by that act, and who were required to be elected in congressional districts.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I will give the reasons why I assume that this first section of the code does not relate to or fix the time of the election of Representatives in Congress. The learned and able gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Elections, as I understand, insists that the word "district" in the first section of the code relates to the election of Representatives in Congress. Now, sir, I happened to know the gentleman who prepared the revised code of West Virginia, a very distinguished democratic lawyer of Wheeling, and I have his authority for saying that the word "district" in the first section of the code does not relate to the election of Representatives in Congress, but that it was inserted in reference to the election of senators and assessors, who, in West Virginia, were elected in districts; and I have further to say that if that word "district" did relate to the election of Representatives in Congress, the time, nevertheless, was changed to the fourth Thursday of August, as I will endeavor to show.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will my friend allow me to say that the authority of this gentleman is very poor authority in the discussion of a question of law; and that that word "district" does not refer to senators is demonstrated, as the committee claim, by the fact that members of the Legislature are specially mentioned in the first section?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly aware that the testimony of a gentleman as to the meaning of the statute, though he may have drawn it, is not conclusive at all. It is not competent, indeed, to advise a court by such means. But I insist that the word "district" relates to the election of senators and the election of assessors, because there were such officers in the State to whom that provision could apply, and because the election of Representatives in Congress is specifically provided for in the second section of the code, and as a question of legal construction it is not reasonable to presume that the Legislature would have intended to provide under that term "district" in the first section, for the election of Representatives in Congress, when they had specifically provided for that in the second section of the code.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. So they have for the governor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Now the proposition I was about to endeavor to state was that the constitutional convention was authorized to change the first section of the code to which I have referred, and that they had done so when their work was adopted by the people by a vote taken in pursuance of the new constitution, on the fourth Thursday of August. Section 20 of the law, under which the convention was called, makes this provision:

That the said convention shall provide, by an ordinance or otherwise, for submitting the said constitution to the people for ratification or rejection.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the authority conferred upon the convention, that body adopted a schedule, of which sections 3 and 7 are as follows:

SEC. 3. The officers authorized by existing laws to conduct general elections shall cause elections to be held at the several places for voting established by law in each county, on the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, at which elections the votes of all persons qualified to vote under the existing constitution, and offering to vote, shall be taken upon the question of ratifying or rejecting this constitution and schedule.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 7. On the same day, and under the superintendence of the officers who shall conduct the election for determining the ratification or rejection of the constitution and schedule, elections shall be held at the several places of voting in each county for senators and members of the house of delegates, and all officers, executive, judicial, county, or district, required by this constitution to be elected by the people.

These sections provide for submitting to the vote of the people the constitution which they had adopted; and it was submitted and ratified by the people by their vote on the fourth Thursday of August. It will be observed, too, that by the terms of the new constitution it became operative from and including the fourth Thursday of August, so that it took effect on the first moment of that day, though the election was held during the day.

Now, sir, it will be seen, too, from this constitution that it was provided that there should be an election on that same day, the fourth Thursday of August, for every officer authorized by the constitution. It is a fact also that there was no other election authorized or held in West Virginia in that year for any officer under State authority.

I take it, then, that the election held was a "general election." And these provisions, all taken together, so modified the first section of the code that it may be said fairly to read in this wise—I give what is the legal effect of the first section of the code, as modified by the new constitution. It will then read thus:

A general election of State, district, and county officers, and members of the Legislature shall be held on the fourth Thursday of August.

I omit "township officers," who are found in the original first section of the code, because the new constitution abolished these and substituted others (district officers) in their places.

Now, the first section of the code having been changed in the manner I have indicated, we are prepared to see what application the second section of the code has to this general election, and to the election for Representatives in Congress. The second section of the code as it originally stood, and yet stands, provides that—

At the said elections in every year there shall be elected delegates to the Legislature, and one senator for every senatorial district. And in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, a governor, secretary of the state, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the State, a prosecuting attorney, surveyor of lands, recorder, and the number of assessors prescribed by law, and a Representative in the Congress of the United States, for the term beginning on the 4th day of March next after the election, for every congressional district.

Here, then, we have two provisions of law, and this second section of the code is not to be construed with reference to the first section as it originally stood, but with reference to the first section as it was amended. So that whether the expression in the second section, "at the said election" refers either to the event of the general election, or to the time prescribed therefor, it refers to the time as fixed, not by the original first section, but by the amended section 1 of the code.

And in support of that proposition, allow me to refer to one or two principles of legal construction to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and particularly of the legal gentlemen of this body. It is a well-known principle that statutes in pari materia are to be read and considered together, all as parts of one statute, though they may have been adopted at different times. Now, taking that well-known rule of construction, you are to take the first section of the code as it stood amended and in force on the fourth Thursday of August; and you are to read the second section in reference to that first section as it then stood, and not the first section as it originally was.

But that is not all. I have an authority upon that point which I find in the ninth volume of Ohio State Reports, page 627, McKibbin vs. Ellis. I have no time to read it, but by analogy it settles the principle that where amendment is made of one section of a statute all the other sections of the statute are to be read with reference to the new section as it is incorporated by amendment into the original statute. And if that authority is correct it is conclusive of this question.

Will any gentleman say that the constitutional convention had no power to change the time for the election of officers under State authority? If so, then I call attention to a case decided by the court of appeals of New York, the case of Pierce vs. Delamater, (1 Comstock, 17,) decided in 1847. The syllabus of the case is this: "A constitution may by implication repeal a statute."

The facts were these. Under the constitution of 1821 a statute was enacted which prohibited a judge of an appellate court from taking part in the decision of a case determined by him when sitting as judge of an inferior court. The constitution of 1846 conferred the same power on all the judges of the court of appeals, which is the highest court in that State; and also upon the justices of the supreme court when sitting in the court of appeals. This provision of the constitution was held to be a repeal of the statute.

Is any further authority required? If it is, then I refer to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States, which repealed and swept away many of the State statutes, and many of the acts of Congress which were in conflict with those provisions. And then I assert that the new constitution of West Virginia swept away and changed the statutes in conflict therewith, just as these amendments to the Constitution of the United States have changed statutes.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I dislike to take up any of the gentleman's time, but will he yield for one moment?

Mr. LAWRENCE. For a question.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. If the new constitution may repeal statutes, upon which point I agree with the gentleman, then I ask him how much of section 1 of chapter 3 of the code did the new constitution of West Virginia repeal? Did it repeal or change the time as to the election of the district officers? When will they be elected; next fall?

Mr. LAWRENCE. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I think it is enough to discuss the question under consideration, and not to undertake to settle questions which may arise in the future. All district officers created by the new constitution were elected, as it required, on the fourth Thursday of August. And it has been sufficiently shown that section 1 of the code has been changed, and is now to be read as though it declared that in the year 1872 an election for State, county, and district officers, should be had on the fourth Thursday of August of that year. The conclusion at which I arrive, then, is, that in West Virginia for the year 1872, the new constitution, and the first section of the code, construed together, fixed or required an event, and prescribed the time of that event.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LAWRENCE. If it will not come out of my time.

Mr. LAMAR. In a former speech that the gentleman made he used the following language:

Now the code of 1868, in express terms, declares that "at the general election for State and county officers there shall be elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States for every congressional district."

The language is "at the general election." Will the gentleman point me to the section of the code containing the words which he professes to quote?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will. I am very glad my friend has asked me the question. And I will undertake to show that the election for Representative in Congress is fixed by the expression in the second section of the code, "the said elections."

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman does not understand me. I did not ask him for an argument upon which he bases his construction. I want the clause that he professes to quote.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My idea of the new constitution and the code, all construed together, is that they did in express terms fix the time for the election of Representatives in Congress in 1872 on the fourth Thursday of August. That is certain which can be rendered certain. The words of the second section of the code "at the said election" refer to the event mentioned in the amended first section, and thus in express terms fix the time of the election of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir. You did not say "at the said elections," but you said "at the general election," as the express words of the code. Now I want you to show those express words.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The original section 1 of the code required an event—a "general election." It fixed the time of it. The time was changed to the fourth Thursday of August. It is not denied, and I presume it is now proved, that the constitutional convention had power to make the change.

Now, when the second section of the code declared that "at the said election" Representatives in Congress should be elected, it referred to the event—the "general election," mentioned in section 1 of the code; and thus in express terms fixed the election for Representatives in 1872, at the time of the "general election" of that year. And the only election held for "State, district, and county officers, and members of the Legislature," in 1872 was held on the fourth Thursday of August. It was a "general election." It was so from the fact that all officers required by the constitution were then elected. If it was not a "general election," there was none such that year. And as Representatives in Congress could only be elected at a "general election" "for State, district, and county officers," this must have been the time for the election of Representatives in Congress or there was no authorized time.

The Legislature in enacting the original code sections to which I have referred had in view two modes of fixing the time for election. One was by reference to an event, and the other was by fixing a day. When the Legislature, in section 1 of the code, prescribed the time for the election of State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, they fixed a prescribed day. When they undertook to fix the time for the election of Representatives they said nothing about a prescribed day; but they did refer to an event. The Legislature, in section 2 of the code, used the expression, "at the said elections," referring to the general election—to the event—prescribed in section 1, whenever that event might be. The Legislature seem purposely to have avoided any words in section 2 which might define a fixed day. On the contrary the time was fixed by reference to an event. The first section fixes a time, the second purposely avoids this and adopts another mode.

Now, sir, what are we asked to believe by the able chairman of the Committee on Elections, [Mr. SMITH, of New York,] and by my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR]—what are we asked to believe is the true construction of the second section of the code? We are asked to believe that this second section, which says nothing about a prescribed day, has fixed a prescribed day. We are asked to believe that section 2 which refers to an event, and not to a day, does not mean an event, but does mean a day. We are asked to believe that when no day is named a day is intended, and that when an event is named an event is not intended.

Nil fuit unquam sic impar sibi.

I should like to hear some gentleman reconcile the conflict between the demand upon our credulity and the palpable force of the language of this code.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, rose.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We are asked to believe that proposition, which, so far as I am capable of apprehending it, is absurd.

Mr. Speaker, in giving construction to the code and the new constitution, we are to be governed by rules familiar to the legal profession. We must construe them—we must construe the code, either by the words employed in them, or by what was the probable intention of the Legislature, or by the usage under it, or by the reasons which may be supposed to have operated on the Legislature. First of all, I say that the words "said elections," used in section 2, naturally import or refer to the event fixed by section 1, and not the time prescribed in it. I say it is probable the Legislature intended that the event of a "general election," whenever it might occur, should fix the time of the election of Representatives in Congress, because it is absurd to suppose that the Legislature designed that there should be two elections in one year when all could be done at one time, thus saving expense and trouble to the people.

I say that the proper construction of these two sections of the code has been fixed by usage in the State of Virginia under other and similar statutes.

The act of January 3, 1803, provided "that the election of the members of the Legislature of this Commonwealth, and of the members of the House of Representatives of the United States to which this State is entitled, shall be held in the several counties and corporations on the respective court days, in the month of April." There was an event —the "court day"—by which the Legislature of Virginia, as early as 1803, fixed the time for the election of Representatives in Congress.

Ten years later, on the 6th of February, 1813, this law was re-enacted in the following words, to be found on page 151 of the revised code of 1819:

2. And be it further enacted, That the persons qualified by law to vote for members of the House of Delegates in each county, city, and borough composing a district, shall assemble at their respective court-houses, or other places appointed by law for holding elections, on the first day of their April court, in the year 1813, also on the first day of their April court in every second year thereafter, and there and then vote for some discreet and proper person qualified, according to the Constitution of the United States, as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Here, again, the time of electing Representatives in Congress was fixed by an event. This was the approved mode of determining the time.

The Legislature determined the time for the election, not by a prescribed day, but by an event—the convening of the court. The time for holding the courts was, by subsequent acts of the Legislature, changed from time to time; and it was always held that a change in the time of holding the court carried with it a change of the time of electing Representatives in Congress; in other words, a change of the time fixed for the event carried with it the election of Representatives in Congress.

The same mode of fixing the time and the same mode of construing statutes has been adopted in other States, as has been abundantly shown in this debate, and in the opinions accompanying the report of the Committee on Elections.

Now, I ask, when the Legislature of West Virginia had fixed an event, the election of State officers, by section 1 of their code, and in section 2 had said that the Representatives in Congress should be elected at the same time when this event occurred, if there was a change of the time fixed in section 1 for that event, why would not that change carry a change of the event in the election of Representatives to Congress under that code as well as under the acts of 1803 and 1813. Will some gentleman answer this?

Sir, this usage in Virginia is a practical construction given to a statute in force in the old State of Virginia through its whole history, similar in character to the code of West Virginia; and if we determine otherwise now in reference to the code, we say that the practice of Congress and of the State of Virginia from 1803 until West Virginia was erected into a new State was all wrong, and that those engaged in it did not understand what they were doing. The statesmen and jurists of the "Old Dominion" did not err in construing their election laws, and if they did, communis error facit jus.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask the gentleman whether the days for the meeting of the courts were not ascertained or fixed by the act of the Legislature in every case—whether there was a single occasion or precedent in which the time was not fixed by the Legislature?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not.

Mr. LAMAR. The time was never fixed by a convention?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly; but the point I make is, that it is the event which determines the time for the election of Representatives, and when the time of that event is changed by competent authority, as the time of the general election for State officers was changed by the new constitution of West Virginia, it carries with it by force of the authorities I have cited—by force of the legal principles to which I have referred—the election of Representatives in Congress. It has been said that the old constitution of West Virginia required the new constitution to be submitted to a vote of the people as it was, and that it further provided that "in no event" shall it "be made to have any retrospective operation or effect." (Article 12, section 1.)

As a question of constitutional law, the old constitution could prescribe the mode of securing a new constitution. That was decided in the Dorr rebellion case. But it could not limit the power of a convention and the people as to the operation and effect of the new constitution. If this be not so, then hoary abuses provided for in a parchment roll could never be remedied. The new constitution declares it "shall be operative and in full force from and including the fourth Thursday of August, 1872." This, ratified by the people, made it so operative, and abrogated all limitations attempted to be imposed by the old constitution. But there is no conflict, in fact, between the old and new constitutions. It is a rule of law that fractions of days will not be noticed, subject to certain limitations not now material. The moment the new constitution was ratified it took effect, not for the remaining fraction of a day, but for the whole day. To hold otherwise, would call in question the validity of the election of State, county, and district officers, and members of the Legislature in West Virginia. The State of West Virginia has decided that question in favor of the validity of the election. The new officers in West Virginia took the offices to which elected. The new State government superseded or followed the old one in succession, by universal consent. No lawyer ventured to deny the correctness of this. The question is settled, and we should accept the decision. The vote on ratification on the fourth Thursday of August operated by way of "relation," as it is said in the law books. The doctrine of "relation" is well understood, and its principles are often applied.

I have no time to discuss other features of this contest, but it seems to me, upon every principle of law, the August election was valid, and the members then elected should be admitted to seats. When I say the members, I mean all. I agree with what was said truly, forcibly, and clearly, in an argument made before the Committee on Elections that—

It has, I think, never been heard, since the Government began, that an election, duly held on the prescribed day, was either overthrown, impaired, or rendered of doubtful validity, by the fact that an election, more numerously attended, may have been held on a day not prescribed, or that a person, duly elected on the right election day, shall lose his election because he was defeated on some other occasion.

This was said, too, in behalf of claimants under the October election. If there was force or fraud, driving voters away from the polls, there might be some reason for holding that no election was had.

But it would be a dangerous principle to hold that a State might be disfranchised in Congress because three-fourths of all the voters in her several congressional districts refused or neglected to attend an election on the prescribed day. Let it be understood that this can keep Representatives out, and a State may practically withdraw from Congress, if not from the Union, by the disloyalty or neglect of her voters. It would be an easy road to the ruin of the Republic.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Speaker, the questions involved in this case arise out of the different provisions of the old and new constitutions, the schedule of the latter, and of the code of West Virginia.

Article 3, section 2, of the constitution of 1863 reads as follows:

The general election of State and county officers and members of the Legislature shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

Sections 1 and 2, chapter 3, of the code of 1869 are as follows:

SECTION 1. The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers and members of the Legislature shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

SEC. 2. At the said elections, in every year, there shall be elected delegates to the Legislature and one senator for every senatorial district. And in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, a governor, secretary of the State, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the State, a prosecuting attorney, surveyor of lands, recorder, and the number of assessors prescribed by law, and a Representative in the Congress of the United States, for the term beginning on the 4th day of March next after the election, for every congressional district.

Article 4, section 7, of the constitution of 1872 is as follows:

The general elections of State and county officers and members of the Legislature shall be held on the second Tuesday of October until otherwise provided by law.

And sections 3 and 7 of the schedule of the constitution of 1872, submitting it to a vote of the people, are in the following words, to wit:

SEC. 3. The officers authorized by existing laws to conduct general elections shall cause elections to be held at the several places of voting established by law in each county, on the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, at which election the votes of all persons qualified to vote under the existing constitution, and offering to vote, shall be taken upon the question of ratifying or rejecting this constitution and schedule. Such votes shall be by ballot. The person voting for the ratification of the constitution and schedule shall have written or printed upon his ballot the words, "For ratification;" and the person voting against ratification shall have written or printed upon his ballot the words, "For rejection."

* * * * * *

SEC. 7. On the same day, and under the superintendence of the officers who shall conduct the election for determining the ratification or rejection of the constitution and schedule, elections shall be held at the several places of voting in each county for senators and members of the house of delegates, and all officers executive, judicial, county, or district, required by this constitution to be elected by the people.

Now, unless the election authorized by those sections of the schedule was a general election, within the intent and meaning of sections 1 and 2, chapter 3, of the code, the case of the claimants under that election must fail.

In my judgment, the August election was a special one, ordered for a specific purpose, growing out of the necessities incident to the launching of a new constitution, the reconstruction of an old State organization, and the selection of its officials under the new organic act in the event of its ratification by the people. It was special, however wide its scope and universal its application to State officers, because it was for a single, specific object, and could not be applied to any other, and because it cannot, in any true and logical sense, be called a general State election, such as is intended by the statute or held to be such by common usage and practice. A general election in an established and organized State is one that periodically occurs, in pursuance of statutory enactments, in support of existing institutions, and that is intended to last for an indefinite period of time, as the means of maintaining and continuing an existing organized State, so that its functions may have uninterrupted continuance and authority.

The August election had none of these qualities. It was intended only for the occasion—and that an extraordinary one—and for no future use, and is shown to be special and temporary by the fact that another and different day is fixed for the general elections in the very constitution submitted at that time for ratification or rejection. In a strict sense it was no election at all, but a mere proposition submitted to the people for acceptance or refusal, and to be barren of results if a majority of votes were cast against its adoption. And herein it radically differs from the commonly received idea of a general election. The latter is always productive of positive, affirmative results, which reach into the future and keep alive and in practical operation existing institutions and laws. The admission that the election for Congressmen would have been null and void had the constitution not been ratified by the people cuts up by the roots the contestants' claims; for it concedes the special character of the August election, and admits that it was a mere experiment, dependent for vital force on a contingency that could be transformed into certainty only by the affirmative act of a power outside of the authority which ordered it. If this be the true nature and character of the August election—and I maintain it is—then all the other questions, involving the sovereign power and legislative authority of the constitutional convention, and whether it did or did not prescribe and fix a day for congressional elections, and subordinate and utilize existing statutes in relation to such elections to its purposes and objects, may be summarily dismissed as having no bearing on the issue, because they are only of importance as auxiliaries to the postulate that the August election was a general election, of the nature and kind contemplated and intended by articles 1 and 2, section 3, of the code.

The next inquiry is, was the fourth Thursday of October the legal day for holding the election for Representatives in Congress from West Virginia?

It is provided in article 1, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States that—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof.

In pursuance of the duty imposed on it by this provision of the Federal Constitution, the Legislature of West Virginia provided, in chapter 3, sections 1 and 2, of the code, for the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives in Congress from that State. These were coincident with those of the general elections for State and county officers. It is true that the time for holding the general elections for State and county officers and members of the Legislature had been fixed in the State constitution, and was therefore obligatory upon the Legislature for State purposes; and for such it was recognized and obeyed in discharge of its duty in this regard.

But another and additional duty was imposed on the Legislature by a higher and supreme authority, which it was bound to obey with even more exactness and certainty than its State duties, and that was, as the one competent authority, specifically to fix and prescribe a time, place, and manner for the election of Representatives in Congress from that State. This obligation was discharged when the Legislature enacted the first and second sections of chapter 3 of the code; and in the light of the dual duty which rested on it, that statute must be read as providing for the election of two distinct classes of officers, holding by different tenures and obligated to different duties, and as if it had been separately enacted for each. For it is manifest that the only object held in view, in embracing both in one statute and making provisions common to both, was to save expense and trouble to the citizens of the State. It is objected that the enactment by the Legislature, in the form of law, of the State constitutional provisions fixing the day for the general election of the State was a vain and useless act, and could add no authority to it. But it did more; it added to that provision other classes of officers which were not included within its terms, by conspicuously prescribing, in exact discharge of legislative duty, the time, place, and manner for the election of Congressmen. To have failed to do so would have been inexcusable dereliction of duty and to deprive the State of representation in Congress. The very fact of the passage of sections 1 and 2 of chapter 3 of the code, to my mind, is conclusive evidence that the Legislature accurately conceived and discharged its duty, and specifically intended and provided, as an independent and separate measure, that elections for Representatives in Congress should be held on the fourth Thursday of October, at the same places and in the same manner prescribed for holding and conducting the general elections for State and county officers. To carry out this design and purpose, it was absolutely necessary to use terms identical with the State constitutional provision, and put them into the form of statutory law; otherwise that provision could have no binding force and would have been inoperative, and no way would have been prescribed for the holding of congressional elections.

This law is still in full force, never having been repealed, and must and will stand as the only authority for holding congressional elections, until the Legislature sees fit, for the sake of convenience and economy, to change it to another day. It is illogical as well as a great error to assert, because the new constitution prescribes a different day, to wit, the second Tuesday of October, for State general elections, that therefore no congressional elections can be held on the fourth Thursday of October, for the reason that no general elections are held on that day. This argument is based on the groundless assumption that a State constitutional convention, called to reform or make the constitution of an existing State and limited by the law which summoned it into being, has power to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding congressional elections, and that the Legislature is bound to adopt and obey such usurped authority; and also in forgetfulness or disregard of the fact that the Legislature alone has jurisdiction over the subject, conferred and enjoined on it by the Constitution of the United States, and that it had already made full and perfect provision for it. The law providing for and regulating the election of State officers has its source in the State constitution; that for the election of congressional Representatives in the Constitution of the United States. Each is imperative and absolute within its own sphere, and may and do have entire freedom of action, without jostling or infringing on each other, although concurrent in time, place, and manner. This concurrence may be severed by State action, either through a simple act of Assembly or by a change in its organic law; and there is no rule or law that inhibits such severance or makes it invalid. In this instance it may justly be inferred that the Legislature, inasmuch as it adjourned before the August election, and in presence of the uncertainty attending the adoption of the new constitution, refrained from changing the law governing the election of congressional Representatives, and preferred for the time being that the inconvenience and expense of an election on the fourth Thursday of October should be borne, rather than anticipate the ratification of the constitution by the people, by changing in this regard existing laws into conformity with its provisions. That such change will be made before another congressional election occurs is not to be doubted, in view of the benefits that will result therefrom.

But although I maintain that the fourth Thursday of October is the legal day on which Representatives in Congress must be chosen, I deny that any valid election was held on that day, or such a one as entitles the parties claiming to have been elected at that time either legally or equitably to seats in this House. The first district is composed of fifteen counties, containing, according to the census of 1870, an aggregate population of 147,139, and an average vote of 29,428. Of this vote Mr. Wilson received, on the fourth Thursday of October, 3,708 votes, and thirty-nine other candidates 452 votes—in all less than one-seventh of the whole vote. If, however, we accept the votes cast at the August election, at which Mr. Wilson was a candidate, and which was, perhaps, a fair average poll except in the county of Wirt, where but a half vote was cast, as reliable data, we have the following exhibits:

Showing that less than one-sixth of the vote in August was polled in October; and that Mr. Wilson received less than one-third as many votes in October as he did in August.

It is affirmed, and no doubt truthfully, that polls were opened in but one or two precincts in each county; that the election was held by volunteers, the legally qualified election officers having refused to conduct it; that no legal or public notice was given for the election; that all of one party, which was the majority in the district, abstained from voting, on the ground that the election had been legally held in August; that but a small fraction of the defeated minority participated in it; that public opinion was hopelessly divided and at fault in regard to the propriety and legality of the proceeding. Considering that Mr. Davis, at the August election, received over 13,000 votes; that both parties at that time, through their representative men, put in nomination candidates for Congress; that the people accepted and approved of such action, and voted for Congressmen at that time and acted in good faith according to the lights before them; and that Mr. Wilson was then a candidate and only protested against its validity after suffering defeat, it is impossible for any one to affirm that a valid election for Congressmen was held in that district in October, or fail to perceive its true character. In the light of such facts, it is farcical to claim for it the qualities and force of an election whereat the people have exercised a full, free, and unrestrained choice for a Representative. Contrast such an election with one regularly and legally held, after full notice and with a clear understanding on the part of the people of their duties, rights, and privileges, and it will be apparent that it is destitute of all the elements that entitled it to respect or recognition. It was a surprise and a fraud on the people—an audacious and unscrupulous stratagem, instigated by the desperate hope of achieving that success which experience taught its daring perpetrators was impossible in a fair and legitimate contest. It was not a valid election, because it was not fair and open; nor was it an expression of popular sentiment, because only a small part of the people were permitted to participate in it, a majority having been excluded by the fraudulent acts and conduct of the very men under whose auspices it was held.

I freely admit that there is no precedent in the books for declaring a seat vacant merely on account of the paucity of the vote polled; but there are a multitude of cases where this element, supported by circumstances of fraud, intimidation, or hinderances springing out of exterior influences and forces that prevented, interfered with, or fettered free, full, and intelligent action and choice by the people, has been given a preponderating and controlling effect in conclusions that remitted them to the judgment of the people at another election. The principle established by all the cases requires that all elections shall be free, open, and notorious, and that the people must have a full opportunity to exercise their untrammeled choice of representatives, and that in the absence of such prerequisites the fact of a meager vote is decisive of the invalidity of the election. Such a vote is not a minor element in making up the judgment, but a leading master-power, that needs but slight support to make its influence irresistible and conclusive in overthrowing elections when it is conspicuously present.

I ask the Clerk to read what the committee say in the case of McFarland vs. Culpepper, of North Carolina, (Contested-Election Cases, volume 1, page 223.)

The Clerk read as follows:

From the testimony admitted, it appears that John Culpepper is not entitled to a seat in the House, he not having a majority of votes legally taken; but though Duncan McFarland appears to have a large majority of votes taken agreeably to law, yet the committee are of opinion that the truth of this is doubtful; they are the more confirmed in this opinion from the sitting member's having expressed his opinion that if he had time allowed him to make a scrutiny, he would prove the elections held in the other counties were also conducted contrary to law.

The committee, however, believing that the great object for which the power of judging of the election of members was vested in Congress was to secure to the people a representation of the majority of the citizens, the elections of Richmond, Anson, and Montgomery being rejected, give a majority of the votes taken in Moore and Cumberland Counties to Duncan McFarland, namely, a majority of two counties out of five, which compose the congressional district, and the votes of three counties are lost.

The committee are of opinion that, even presuming the votes in Moore and Cumberland to have been legally taken, it would be improper to deprive the other three counties of a representation for the fault of their election officers, &c., and therefore think it most proper to give the citizens of that district an opportunity to have another election, and for this purpose submit the following resolution.

Mr. TODD. I ask the Clerk to read from the report of the committee in the case of Cloud vs. Wing, of Virginia, (Contested-Election Cases, volume 2, page 49.)

The Clerk read as follows:

But turning from an examination of the conformity to legal requirements in this election to the question whether the voters of this district, conforming as nearly to law as possible, have, unrestrained and unawed by the presence of any considerable rebel force, had full and fair opportunity to express their choice of a Representative, the committee find that but 1,402 votes in all were cast in a district usually polling about 10,000 votes; that of the eleven counties composing this district polls were opened in only four of them, and not in every precinct in these four, for the reason that they were in the armed occupation of the rebels. No polls could, therefore, be opened, and not a single voter—be the number what it may in this much the greater portion of the district—could cast a vote, or in any way have a voice in the selection of a Representative. According to the uniform rule adopted by the committee and sustained by the House this has failed, in any just sense, to be the election of a Representative from the second district in Virginia. The committee, therefore, report adversely upon the right of either claimant to the seat.

Mr. TODD. In the case of McKenzie, Virginia, same book, page 462, the committee say:

The Clerk read as follows:

But the committee went further, and inquired, as in all other cases, into the character of the election itself, and find that, in point of fact, there was no election in seven out of nine counties composing this district; that an election in nearly all the other counties would have been an impossibility, for they are all, with a trifling exception, in the armed occupation of our own and the rebel armies, mostly of the rebel army. It appeared that a writ for this election reached the sheriff or other proper officer of Prince William County, who was the next day himself arrested by the rebels, and taken with his writ to Richmond, where he is now confined in prison. However loyal the people of these counties may be, they have had no opportunity to testify that loyalty at the ballot-box. While seven-ninths of the district is under duress, the action of the other two-ninths can never be taken as the choice of the district. At the election in 1857 for Representatives, this district cast 9,273 votes, and is believed to have been larger in 1859. On this occasion there were cast, in all, only 554 votes; of which Mr. McKenzie had only 227. That a large part of the voters are absent from the district is very probable; but until the opportunity can be given those who remain, be they many or few, to vote, there can, in the nature of things, be no election. According to all the precedents laid down by the committee, and adopted by the House, they are compelled to report against the validity of this election.

Mr. TODD. In the case of Pigott, North Carolina, same book, page 463, the committee say:

The Clerk read as follows:

The view taken by the committee of all the facts of this case, as they were made to appear, rendered it unnecessary to inquire how nearly in conformity to the forms of law this election had been conducted, or what were the powers of the military governor who issued the proclamation under which it was held. For this reason they do not trouble the House with citations from the North Carolina law of elections, or with arguments upon the powers of a military governor. The whole number of votes cast was 864; of these Mr. Pigott had 595 votes, all others 269 votes. There was no voting at all in but three of the eleven counties composing the district, and in one of these in but a single precinct. There were many voting places in these three counties where no polls were opened or notice taken of the election. In some of these no sufficient reason was shown why they were omitted from participation; but in most of them, in these three counties, the presence of armed rebels and incursions of guerrillas rendered the attempt wholly impossible. The remaining eight counties were almost, if not entirely, in the armed occupation of the rebels. It was frankly admitted by Mr. Pigott that the number of loyal voters in the district who, for this reason, had no opportunity to cast their votes at all was greater than the number who had any such opportunity. According to the rules adopted by the committee in all similiar cases, and steadily adhered to by the House, this puts an end to the case.

Mr. Pigott can in no just sense be deemed the choice of the loyal voters of a district in which more than half of them had no opportunity to express that choice. Voters may voluntarily stay away from the polls, and they are thereby taken and deemed to have acquiesced in what was done by those who are present. But no such presumption rests upon those who are under duress; and it can never be known that they would not have made choice of another if the iron grasp of the rebellion had been unloosed.

Mr. TODD. In the case of Grafflin, same book, page 464, the committee say:

The Clerk read as follows:

The election itself, had the day upon which it was held been authorized by law, like that in the case of McKenzie, already alluded to, was not a general election in the whole district, but only a partial and imperfect one, in which much the largest portion of the voters of the district took no part and had no opportunity to take part. No notices were served and no polls opened; and if there had been, no voter could, with safety to his property, his liberty, or his life, have voted in much the largest portion of the district. The committee regret that they cannot find any ground for pronouncing this an election in any just sense of that term. After a careful revision of the decision to which they arrived in the case of McKenzie, already stated, which was sustained by the House, they see no occasion to question its correctness, and they therefore report the accompanying resolution, and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That Christopher L. Grafflin is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the eighth congressional district of Virginia.

The House agreed to the report without a division.

Mr. TODD. To these I might add others, but they are a sufficient support in aid of the principle I invoke in these cases. Do they not rule them, and commit the House to the duty of declaring the seats vacant, and sending the parties back for another election? Even if there were no analogous precedents, this House is not estopped from adopting any rule that will protect the people in the full enjoyment of their rights. Precedents are only valuable in aiding the House in arriving at just conclusions; and are not, in their nature, obligatory, simply because they are precedents. The maxim, stare decisis, has no application here, inasmuch as we have plenary and exclusive jurisdiction over the question of membership, and can make and unmake rules, as the necessities and peculiar character of each case may need and require. We must prevent injustice and fraud, guard with watchful and zealous care popular liberty, and protect the sanctity of the right of suffrage from the unhallowed touch of those who seek to defile its purity and prostitute it to their own selfish and fraudulent purposes. Here is the citadel of popular right, and it must be defended from invasion and capture by the free use of all means of defense and resistance, even if such means of resistance are improvised for the emergency, and have been heretofore unknown to the trained defenders to whom its custody and care have been committed. Who can say, without a conscious blush of shame, that the election of the fourth Thursday of October was not a fraud and imposition upon the people of West Virginia? Who can ascribe to it a single quality that represents the popular sentiment of that State? Who can say that it was bona fide either in conduct or intent, or assert that it was not planned to defeat the popular judgment and impose on the people men whom they had deliberately and intelligently rejected?

For the purpose of proving what the people of West Virginia think of the October election, and as an indication of their wishes and views, I ask the Clerk to read the following article from the West Virginia Journal:

The Clerk read as follows:

Back to the people.—We are informed that the Election Committee of the House of Representatives at Washington will favor the remanding back to the people of West Virginia the question of who shall represent us in the United States Congress. This action if decided upon will receive a hearty indorsement by every intelligent mind and honest citizen in our State. A few interested partisans only will fail to approve. From their hands and their intrigue we ask to be delivered.

One of the first principles of a representative republican government is that the will of the people should be consulted in the selection of those who administer the supreme laws of the land. It is the duty of Congress to see that the people of every State have fair opportunity to express that will. To perform this duty is to aid in the preservation of a republican form of State government; not to perform it is to permit anarchy and confusion to rest their nightmare upon the rights of the masses.

In the various elections of West Virginia, upon which basis rests the claims of every petitioner now before Congress for a seat in the House, it cannot be denied that a majority of the voters expressed no distinct choice between aspiring congressional candidates. So much doubt hung around the proper period that no vote was cast that should entitle any claimant to recognition as a representative of the people.

As the figures for these elections have been called for we reproduce them that the case may be more clearly seen.

By the census of 1870, West Virginia has a voting population of 93,435.

In the August, 1872, election, upon the question of the ratification of the constitution, there was polled a vote of 81,875. Notwithstanding the well-known fact that at this election only one ballot could be cast for all the officers voted for, yet the aggregate vote for Congressmen was only 44,918, showing conclusively that 36,957 voters in attendance who had expressed their choice as to State officers, refused, on legal or other grounds, to express themselves as to Congressmen. This large number of voters, then, failed to recognize the August period as a legal one.

From the governor's proclamation we take the following figures as to the 44,918 citizens who did give expression to their choice:

Of the 81,875 voters for a new constitution, 36,957 declined to vote for Congressmen in August. In October 59,699, or about three-fourths, declined to vote.

To recognize the August period would be to concede the authority of a convention in the selection of a time for congressional election. The Constitution of the United States reserves this to the Legislature of each State. It would be also to ignore the silent opinion and will of 36,957 voters who abstained from a ballot for Representatives.

To recognize the October period would be to perpetrate a fraud upon the people of the State of West Virginia, and to say that one-fourth of her voters may be heard, and the will of three-fourths, clearly indicated in their absence from the polls, be ignored and set aside.

In the name of these 69,659 voters, who in confusion and doubt of the lawful time, intentionally declined to recognize either period, we respectfully ask that the Congress of the United States remand the question back to the people for their will in a new election, the time of which shall be definitely fixed and legally settled.

Mr. TODD. In view, therefore, of all the history and surroundings of the October election, its baldness of merit, its partial and fractional character and factious purposes, I am persuaded that justice can only be done by recommitting the cases to the committee, with power to send for persons and papers, so that a full and thorough investigation may be made, and the House put in possession of the means of disposing of the cases intelligently and justly.

I yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HYDE.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. G. F. HOAR.) Does the gentleman from Missouri take the floor in his own right or in the right of his colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TODD?]

Mr. HYDE. I desire to take the floor if I shall have time to conclude what I have to say to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman would be entitled to the floor in his own right.

Mr. HYDE. I understand that the time of the House after two o'clock to-day is assigned for business reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to an hour in his own right.

Mr. HYDE addressed the House, but had not concluded his remarks when the hour of two o'clock arrived.

The SPEAKER. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Committee on the District of Columbia is entitled to the floor. The consideration of the election cases will be resumed after the business of the committee is disposed of.

Mr. HYDE. I would conclude in about fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman as soon as the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia is disposed of.

EDUCATION OF INDIGENT BLIND.

Mr. PELHAM, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 184) to provide for the better education of the indigent blind in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read. In its preamble it recites that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized by law to educate the indigent blind of the District of Columbia in some State institution for the blind, and that the Legislature of the District of Columbia has authorized the establishing of a school for the blind in the District, under the title of the Columbia Institution for the Blind. The bill therefore authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, at his discretion, to cause all the blind who are now, or who may hereafter become, entitled under the act of Congress approved February 23, 1865, amending the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and Blind," approved February 16, 1857, to be instructed in some institution for the education of the blind in Maryland or some other State, hereafter to be instructed in the Columbia Institution for the Blind, at a cost not greater for each pupil than is, or may for the time being be, required to be paid by other pupils in the said Columbia Institution for the Blind; the same to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. I reserve the point of order on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Should not this bill go to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RANDALL. It is a public bill.

Mr. PELHAM. It does not make any appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It may involve one, for it closes with these words: "the same to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. PELHAM. I know that line is at the end of the bill; but it is entirely superfluous, and not needed there. The bill does not ask for an appropriation, but it merely provides that the Secretary of the Interior may cause the indigent blind of the District to be educated here in the District or elsewhere, in his discretion. Under the law as it now stands the Secretary of the Interior is obliged to send the indigent blind for education to Maryland or some other State; that is the law. This bill simply allows him, in his discretion, to have them educated here in the District or elsewhere. Under the law as it stands "the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and Blind" could not receive the indigent blind of the District in that institution, even though they might be willing to educate them more cheaply and were able to educate them better than could be done in Baltimore. This bill simply gives the Secretary of the Interior the right to educate the indigent blind, whose education is already provided for at an institution in this District or elsewhere, in his discretion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think, with that statement of the case, that this bill would be amenable to the point of order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Would not the expenditure of money under authority of this bill hereafter make it the subject of a point of order?

The SPEAKER. Already provision is made for the education of the indigent blind in other institutions. The Chair understands that this bill merely enables the Secretary of the Interior to send them to an institution in this District, at the same expense now provided by law, and even at a less expense.

Mr. STORM. Is not this a public bill? I think it should be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. PELHAM. There is not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there should be a report, so that the facts might be given to the House.

Mr. PELHAM. The facts appear upon the records of the House. The first bill was passed in 1857, and that was amended by a bill passed February 23, 1865.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask the Chair, as it may be important to have the ruling upon the point now, whether this bill does not involve this principle: that a bill re-enacting a previous appropriation of money really makes a new appropriation, it gives a new legal effect to an appropriation. If so, would not the bill come clearly under the rule? It would be in order to provide by an amendment of the bill for a larger appropriation; for instance, to say that instead of ten dollars a week, the cost at present in the institution in Maryland, the Secretary of the Interior may hereafter expend twenty dollars a week for each student.

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] states the case, the bill would be amenable to the point of order. But the Chair does not think that changing the expenditure of an appropriation from one point to another would render the bill amenable to the rule. To revive an appropriation that has lapsed would fall under the rule.

Mr. PELHAM. This bill does not revive an appropriation; nothing of the kind. Under the law as it now stands the Secretary of the Interior is charged with the instruction of the indigent blind of the District, and by an act of Congress he is required to send them to Maryland or to some other State. This bill merely gives him the authority to have them educated in the District of Columbia if he shall see proper.

The SPEAKER. The point of order the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has suggested would not necessarily be fatal to the bill. Even if it were amendable by putting in an increased appropriation, it would be carried to the Committee of the Whole by that amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Would it be in the power of any member, by moving an amendment making an appropriation, to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules it would only be in the power of the majority, not of a single member, to send a bill to the Committee of the Whole by means of an amendment making an appropriation.

Mr. PELHAM. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, the law of 1865.

Mr. KASSON. I also ask to have read the late rule of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and Blind," approved February 16, 1857.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of said act as requires the teaching of the blind in said institution be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the corporate name and style thereof shall hereafter be "The Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb."

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause all indigent blind children who are now, or may hereafter become, entitled under the law as it now exists, to instruction in said institution, to be instructed in some institution for the education of the blind, in Maryland or some other State, at a cost not greater for each pupil than is, or may be for the time being, paid by such State, and to cause the same to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after the 30th day of June, 1865.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under this law would not an annual appropriation be required to carry it into effect? The effect of the proposed bill it seems to me involves the appropriation itself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state the condition of facts under which he supposes the gentleman from Alabama has reported the bill, and under which he holds it does not come under the rule of sending it to the Committee of the Whole.

If there were an existing law for the education of the blind at a certain expense in the Maryland institution, and if this bill merely provided that pupils should be educated at the same expense in the Columbia institution, the Chair would hold that the bill would not fall under the rule which would send it to the Committee of the Whole. The principle on which the Chair makes the ruling will be understood by this illustration: suppose an appropriation of $100,000 were made for the purchase of Army stores in the city of Saint Louis, and the next day a bill should be brought in providing that those Army stores should be purchased at San Francisco instead of Saint Louis, the new bill would not make an appropriation in such a sense as to carry it to the Committee of the Whole. Hence, if the bill now before the House merely proposes to change the place where money already appropriated shall be expended without changing the amount of the expenditure, it is not amenable to the rule. That is the ground upon which the Chair bases his ruling. If the facts are different from what the Chair has understood them to be, the ruling would be different.

Mr. PELHAM. The Chair has stated the exact condition of the facts.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to call attention to the fact that under the existing law the cost of educating the blind of this District in the States is to be measured by the expense of supporting other pupils in those institutions, while under the bill now presented it is to be measured by a different standard.

Several MEMBERS. No, sir.

Mr. PELHAM. This bill does not provide whether pupils shall be sent to Maryland, or Boston, or anywhere else, but simply that they may be educated here, if the Secretary of the Interior is of opinion that it can be done here at less expense. Under the law as it now stands, if there were in this District the best school for the blind in the land, and if such an institution would educate blind children for one-half what their education would cost elsewhere, the Secretary of the Interior is not allowed to have the indigent blind educated in this District. All that this bill does is simply to allow him to use his discretion in providing for their education here or elsewhere, as he may think best.

Mr. POTTER. I would like to get some further information about this bill from the gentleman who has it in charge. It is now fifteen years since we adopted the system under which the indigent blind of this District have been sent for education to blind asylums already established in the States. Most of these State asylums receive indigent pupils of the State at a fixed price; and, as I understand, the Secretary of the Interior, under the existing law, has power to send the indigent blind of this District to such State asylums as he may think best, paying for their education and support such sum as the institution may charge for pupils belonging to the State itself.

It is now proposed to change this law, which has been in operation some fifteen years, and, so far as I can learn, no good reason is presented for the change. To be sure, the matter is to be left within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior; but obviously, as it seems to me, this measure may be the means of inaugurating before long a great scheme to build up a blind asylum in this District, and to build it up without any reason or necessity.

All experience in the education of the blind has shown that their proper training requires large institutions, liberally endowed, and demanding continuous appropriations to maintain a competent and numerous staff of instructors.

I think it decidedly the interest of this District, and a matter of economy to the Government, that the indigent blind of the District should be received in adjacent State institutions. The operation of this system, as far as I am aware, has not been attended with any objection or difficulty. It is now proposed to change this system, to change it, to be sure, in a permissive form; but I am apprehensive that the result will be, as it has been in many similar cases, that by and by we shall find a plan brought in here to build up a great institution in the city of Washington, for which we shall have to make permanent appropriations, to educate and maintain the indigent blind, who can be fully as well, if not better, taken care of, and with vastly greater economy, under the existing system.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to put a question to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PELHAM.] Suppose pupils are now educated in Maryland at an expense of ten dollars a week, and that pupils in this District could next year be educated at an expense of fifteen dollars a week, will not this bill authorize the Secretary of the Interior to place pupils in the Washington institution at a cost of fifteen dollars a week, although in the Maryland institution the expense is now limited to ten dollars? I do not ask whether the Secretary of the Interior is likely to do this. I merely ask whether this bill does not authorize him to do so, and to bind the United States by such a contract?

Mr. PELHAM. As I understand the bill, it leaves this matter of expense, and everything of that kind, to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman does not apprehend the point of my question. Suppose the charge for educating the indigent blind in this District should be larger than the expense in Maryland, will not the Secretary of the Interior, under this bill, have authority to bind the United States to pay the larger sum? I do not ask whether he is likely to do so, but whether he will not have the right to do so under this bill?

Mr. PELHAM. I do not think he would have the right to do so under the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Why not?

Mr. PELHAM. Because this whole subject is intrusted to his enlarged discretion, and I do not suppose that he would pay fifteen dollars when the same service could be done for ten dollars.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But would he not have the right to make such a contract, and if he did make it, could he not thereby bind the United States under this bill?

Mr. PELHAM. No, sir; this institution, under the bill, could charge no more than the Maryland institution. The Secretary of the Interior would be bound to put these pupils where they could be educated at the least expense.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. This bill authorizes him to place out the pupils at the rate charged in the District of Columbia. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the answer made by the gentleman this bill is very clearly subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen wish to have the bill go to the Committee of the Whole the Chair will so rule. He desires there shall be no dissatisfaction.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to ask whether the Legislature of the District of Columbia appropriated any money as an endowment to this institution which it is said they established?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I will waive the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole.

THE WASHINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following select committee, ordered by the House some days since.

The Clerk read as follows:

Select Committee on the Washington National Monument—N. P. CHIPMAN, of the District of Columbia; HORACE MAYNARD, of Tennessee; FERNANDO WOOD, of New York; JAMES N. TYNER, of Indiana; CHARLES A. ELDREDGE, of Wisconsin; CLINTON L. COBB, of North Carolina; SHERMAN O. HOUGHTON, of California; JAMES WILSON, of Iowa; JOHN B. STORM, of Pennsylvania; JASPER D. WARD, of Illinois; CHARLES PELHAM, of Alabama; EPPA HUNTON, of Virginia, and THOMAS T. CRITTENDEN, of Missouri.

INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

The SPEAKER. Under the law the Speaker of the House is required to appoint two trustees for the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb of the District of Columbia. The Chair announces the following gentlemen: HENRY L. DAWES, of Massachusetts, and WILLIAM E. NIBLACK, of Indiana.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimates for armament for fortifications; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DAVENPORT AND ROCK ISLAND BRIDGES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to House bill No. 966, relative to the use by the public of the bridges and improvements connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL SAVINGS-INSTITUTIONS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in answer to the resolution of December 11, 1873, in reference to how many employés of all grades it will require to carry on the postal savings-institutions in the United States and Territories, and also in reference to the postal-telegraph system.

Mr. RANDALL. That treats of two subjects, and the Committee on Banking and Currency has charge of one of them.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RANDALL. The postal-telegraph system is before the Committee on Appropriations. This law treats of two different subjects.

The SPEAKER. It refers particularly to the postal savings-institutions.

The letter was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HIESTER CLYMER, of Pennsylvania, asks to be excused from further service on the Committee on Revision of the Laws. He will be excused; and the Chair appoints in his place on that committee Mr. MILTON SAYLER, of Ohio.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House in relation to decisions of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury under an act of Congress known as "the-eight hour law;" which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill for the relief of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SUITS AGAINST RAILROAD CORPORATIONS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1871, a statement in relation to certain suits instituted by the Government against certain railroad corporations on account of property sold said corporations by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FORT BRIDGER MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the part of arbitrators convened for the purpose of appraising the valuation of certain buildings on the military reservation of Fort Bridger, Wyoming Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SCHUYLKILL RIVER BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bridge in process of construction across the Schuylkill River at South street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FLINT AND CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to resolution of the House of January 7, 1874, transmitting a report of the surveys of Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers, in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROVIDENCE HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the contract with Providence Hospital, District of Columbia, for the treatment of transient paupers; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT SURGEON W. MATTHEWS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Assistant Surgeon W. Matthews, United States Army, for reimbursement of the value of clothing and other personal property lost by him in consequence of the fire at Fort Buford, Dakota Territory, January 28, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN J. M. ROBERTSON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter of Major J. C. Tidball, Second Artillery, in relation to the petition of Captain J. M. Robertson, Second Artillery, for promotion in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BOUNTIES TO COLORED SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the insufficiency of the unexpended balance of appropriations for the collection and payment of bounties, &c., to colored soldiers and sailors, for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MILWAUKEE HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House, of January 8, 1874, transmitting copy of a report upon the condition, &c., of the harbor at Milwaukee, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M'ELORY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the muster out of William McElory, late first lieutenant United States Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COLONEL WILLIAM GATES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the property lost by Colonel William Gates, who was wrecked on board the steamship San Francisco, in December, 1853; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

CHANNELS BETWEEN LAKES HURON AND ERIE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the board of engineers relative to the practicability of bridging the channels between Lake Huron and Lake Erie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FORT YUMA RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition from citizens of Arizona City, Arizona, asking for the release by the military authorities of a portion of the military reservation of Fort Yuma; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TERRITORIAL SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in reference to an appropriation for the continuation of the geological and geographical surveys of the Territories of the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 18, 1873, in relation to the number of acres of land in the State of Missouri belonging to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 8, 1873, in relation to the expenses incurred in his Department by the abolition of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PAWNEE INDIANS IN NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations for the employment and support of the Pawnee agency in Nebraska during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill to amend the act of June 10, 1872, entitled "An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan;" which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

APACHE INDIANS IN ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of indebtedness on account of collecting upon reservations and subsisting Apache Indians in Arizona and New Mexico prior to July 1, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS IN WASHINGTON AND IDAHO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting draught of a bill to provide for the establishment of a reservation for the Indians of Colville Agency, in the Territory of Washington, and for the Cœur d'Alene Indians, of the Territory of Idaho.

CLAIMS FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act approved May 29, 1872, certain claims for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

ABOLITION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 8, 1873, transmitting a statement of the expenses incurred by his Department in consequence of the abolition of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

INTEREST ON TREASURY NOTES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 8, 1873, in relation to, and the amount paid by, the Treasury for interest on compound-interest notes, the Treasury notes of 1861, &c.

The SPEAKER. This will be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. Should it not rather be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. WOOD. I think it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means. It is in relation to questions now directly before the committee.

The SPEAKER. That was the impression of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. I will not object, then, to its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SHIPPING COMMISSIONERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 12, 1874, in relation to a statement showing the amount or amounts of money paid into the Treasury of the United States under the act of June 7, 1872, authorizing the appointment of shipping commissioners, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of employés in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would suggest that that be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The SPEAKER. It will be so referred, without printing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think this communication should be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It need not be printed, for it is already in print.

The SPEAKER. It is all included in the Blue Book, which the House a day or two since ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEADS FOR ACTUAL SETTLERS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted a report, in writing, to accompany House bill No. 1388, to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SESSION TO-MORROW FOR DEBATE ONLY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the session to-morrow shall be for debate only, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, no business whatever to be transacted. And I desire to say that I do not intend myself to occupy any of the time of the House. I know other gentlemen desire to address the House; and as the Senate has passed a resolution forbidding the Government Printer from publishing in the RECORD any speeches not actually delivered, I think the amplest opportunity should be given gentlemen who desire to make speeches.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I do not desire to oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] but it is my duty to say that there are some four members of the Committee on Elections who desire to be heard upon the West Virginia election cases, and that they have yet had no opportunity to address the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They can speak to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to be that the session for to-morrow shall be for debate only.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly; upon that subject, or upon any other.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. It is my desire to have these cases disposed of as soon as possible. If the House is willing to take them up on Monday I will have no objection to the proposition.

Mr. TODD. A number of gentlemen interested in these West Virginia cases are here in the city at great expense, and desire to return home as soon as possible. I think the House should devote the session of to-morrow to the consideration of practical questions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I thought that there would be but a thin House to-morrow, and no vote could be taken upon any question. And if no vote is to be taken on the West Virginia case to-morrow, but it is to be taken on Monday, I am quite content that the debate shall go on to-morrow on that case.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I am not prepared to say that there will be no vote to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You cannot have it to-morrow, for it is almost certain that there will be but a thin House.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. If the other members of the Committee on Elections do not object, and if it may be generally consented to that the vote on this case shall be had on Monday, I will not object to general debate for to-morrow.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. On Monday directly after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope that nobody will object.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is the proposition that to-morrow shall be devoted to debate on the West Virginia cases only?

Mr. TODD. If a time can be named specifically when the vote can be had upon these West Virginia cases I will withdraw all objection to the session for to-morrow being for general debate. But I desire to have a time fixed definitely when those cases can be disposed of.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is there any objection to taking the vote in the West Virginia cases immediately after the morning hour of Monday?

Mr. SPEER. I certainly must object to that.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it proposed that the debate on to-morrow shall be confined to the West Virginia cases, or is it to be general debate?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Before tellers were ordered,

Mr. TODD said: As it seems to be the general desire that the session for to-morrow may be set apart for general debate, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then again submit the proposition to the House.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Does that include the debate on the West Virginia cases?

The SPEAKER. It does not bring the West Virginia cases before the House, but any gentleman who obtains the floor may speak upon that or upon any other subject. Is there objection that the session of to-morrow be for general debate only as in the Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted?

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 795) making appropriations to pay for reporting the debates and proceedings of Congress; and

An act (H. R. No. 1218) to provide for the purchase of fire-extinguishers for the Capitol building.

FORT KEARNEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. ORR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1407) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation, in Fremont County, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL O. O. HOWARD.

Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) authorizing a special committee of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES DE LONG.

Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition and papers in the case of James De Long, for compensation, and moved that the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. BOWEN.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. No. 1207) for the relief of James W. Bowen, late provost-marshal of the tenth congressional district of Pennsylvania, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That it shall not be lawful for the Congressional Printer to publish in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any speech, or portion of a speech, not actually delivered in the Senate or in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why cannot that be considered now by general consent? I move that the resolution be concurred in.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I hope not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Printing.

WEST VIRGINIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the West Virginia contested-election case.

Mr. HYDE resumed and concluded his remarks. His speech, in full, was as follows:

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, it is not without some degree of embarrassment that I rise to discuss the questions at issue in this case. Those questions are purely legal ones; and my embarrassment is increased by the fact that many of the best legal minds in the House entertain directly opposite opinions in regard to them. But, being a member of the committee to which this matter was referred, a sense of duty impels me to state to the House the reasons for the conclusion at which I have arrived; and it is proper to state that that conclusion was only reached after the most patient and impartial hearing of all that either party to this controversy desired to lay before the committee. No evidence was introduced by either party, but several sittings of the committee were occupied in the discussion of the two cases.

I confess that I was desirous of coming to such a conclusion as would not leave the State of West Virginia unrepresented in this House, and would save her people the trouble and expense of a new election. But after a careful and deliberate examination of the facts and the law, I have been forced to the conclusion that no valid election has been held in West Virginia for Representatives in the Forty-third Congress.

I. THE FACTS.

The facts in the two cases may be briefly stated.

As is well known, two elections for members of the Forty-third Congress have been held in the State of West Virginia. On the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, John J. Davis was elected a Representative in Congress from the first district of West Virginia, and J. M. Hagans from the second district. On the fourth Thursday of October of the same year Benjamin Wilson was elected from the first district, and B. F. Martin from the second district. Davis and Hagans received a majority of all the votes cast for Representatives in August, and Wilson and Martin in October. The question, therefore, for the House to decide is which, if either, of these days was the legal day for the election of Representatives in Congress from that State.

II. CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

As has been before stated during this discussion, the authority to provide for the election of Representatives is conferred upon the Legislatures of the several States by the Constitution of the United States in section 4 of article 1, in these words:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Constitutional convention.—Whether a constitutional convention is a legislature within the meaning of that provision, and therefore clothed with power to provide for the election of Representatives in Congress, is a question which I do not propose to discuss, because, in my judgment, it is not in issue in this case.

I find nothing in the proceedings of the constitutional convention of West Virginia that I can construe into an attempt to regulate the election of Representatives in Congress. But, sir, I am free to say that in my opinion that convention had no authority to prescribe the times, places, or manner of holding such an election; that a constitutional convention, with its powers limited by a former constitution and by the act creating it, merely to framing and proposing a new constitution, is not a Legislature within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. And I submit that there can be found no precedent or authority sustaining the exercise of that power by a constitutional convention, after a State had been admitted into the Union, and had in existence a legally constituted Legislature. But before a State has been admitted into the Union, and hence before it has any legal existence as a State, and is therefore not subject to that provision of the Constitution of the United States, and having no Legislature or constitution to restrict the powers of a constitutional convention, undoubtedly such a convention, elected by the people, might possess general legislative powers, and might provide for the election of Representatives, in anticipation of the admission of the State into the Union.

Legislation.—Assuming, then, in the language of the Constitution, that this power is to be exercised by the Legislature how is it to be exercised?

The Constitution says the "times, places, and manner" of holding elections for Representatives shall be prescribed. To prescribe is to write before. This provision of the Constitution is very precise and explicit. It certainly was intended that these three things, the time, place, and manner of holding the election, should be publicly, definitely, and absolutely fixed before the election, that the people might know to an absolute certainty when and where the election was to be held, and in what manner it was to be conducted. There can be no fair election where these three requisites are not fixed and known beforehand by the people.

Was such the case in West Virginia? Why, sir, I am informed on good authority, though I have not the official lists, (and I hope some gentleman will correct me if I am wrong,) that at the August election there were cast, upon the ratification of the new constitution, 81,875 votes, while at the same election the aggregate vote for members of Congress was only 44,917, and at the October election the total vote was only 22,146.

This was not a case where the people failed to vote through negligence or inadvertence, but because it was believed that the Legislature had failed to prescribe the time for holding the election. The candidates were as much perplexed as the people. Some submitted their claims to the August, others to the October, election, and others still to both. And who knows how many more may be still waiting for a legal election to be prescribed? Who is prepared to maintain that there has been a proper exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution of the United States upon the Legislature of West Virginia to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives, when the people and the candidates are wholly at a loss to know what, if any, day had been fixed; and when the best legal minds differ in regard to the day and as to whether any day at all had been prescribed? Even the gentleman from West Virginia, who has been admitted to his seat, and who spoke the other day with such emphasis and apparent conviction in favor of the validity of the October election, when put to the practical test as a candidate, submitted his name to both elections, and comes here with two certificates of election in his pocket. And I am informed that he received 11,652 votes in August, and only 6,300 votes in October.

III. STATEMENT OF QUESTION.

The questions of law at issue in these cases grow out of a difference of opinion, as to the effect of certain provisions of the code, and of the old and new constitutions of West Virginia. Those provisions I shall consider. The question being whether the August or October election was the legal one, or whether both were illegal, it is immaterial in what order it is considered. I shall first consider the validity of the October election.

IV. THE OCTOBER ELECTION.

Those who maintain the validity of the election held on the fourth Thursday of October rest their case upon the following provisions of the old constitution and code of West Virginia:

The general election of State and county officers, and of members of the Legislature, shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.—Constitution, 1863, article 3, section 2.

SECTION 1. The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

SEC. 2. At the said elections, in every year, there shall be elected delegates to the Legislature, and one senator for every senatorial district. And in the year 1870, and every second year thereafter, a governor, secretary of the State, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the State, a prosecuting attorney, surveyor of lands, recorder, and the number of assessors prescribed by law, and a Representative in the Congress of the United States for the term beginning on the 4th day of March next after the election, for every congressional district.—Code of 1869, chapter 3, sections 1 and 2.

From this it is evident that the time of holding the general election is fixed by the constitution, and that the effect of section 1 of the code is nothing except a repetition for convenient reference.

In regard to the effect of section 2 of code, I submit that the words, "at the said elections," mean not a part, but all that they directly refer to; they mean exactly what is embraced in the first section; no more and no less. They mean the general elections on the fourth Thursday of October.

Those who seek to establish the validity of the October election affirm that the words, "at the said elections," relate only to time, and mean the fourth Thursday of October; while those who maintain the validity of the August election claim that those words refer only to an occasion—to the general elections—and do not fix any definite time for the congressional election. Both are partly right and partly wrong, in my judgment.

The words "at the said elections" designate both a time and an occasion. Not a time independent of an occasion, nor an occasion independent of a time; but they do refer to the general election as then fixed on a specific day.

When the time for holding that general election is changed by proper authority the election for Representatives in Congress must go with it, or it must lapse. The Legislature might have fixed a time for the congressional election independent of any other occasion or election; but they did not do it. If that had been done it would have been beyond the reach of a constitutional convention to change it. But having combined it with another event, it must stand or fall with that event.

Places and manner.—The Legislature was not only required by the Constitution of the United States to prescribe the times, but also the places and manner of holding the elections for Representatives. The Legislature of West Virginia exercised the power by providing not only that it should take place at the same time with the general election, but the places and manner of holding it were to be identical. The machinery for conducting the general elections was to be the machinery for conducting the election for Representatives. These two elections were to be carried on jointly, at the same times, at the same places, and in the same manner, and by the officers of the general election; the votes were to be jointly received, jointly counted, the results jointly ascertained, and jointly certified and declared; and all by the officers of the general election. The Legislature of West Virginia made no provision whatever either of time, place, or manner of holding an election for Representatives in Congress separate from the general elections.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House maintain that there was no power except the Legislature competent to prescribe the times, places, or manner of holding the election for Representatives. I agree with them upon that proposition, and I hope they will stand by its results. Therefore, when the occasion and manner of holding the congressional election have been changed or destroyed by the legitimate action of the constitutional convention in changing that upon which the congressional election had been made to depend, and there being no time, place, or manner fixed for holding it separately, the act of the Legislature, at least, becomes inoperative and incapable of being legally executed.

I presume there is no one who doubts that the general election appointed to be held on the fourth Thursday of October, 1872, was legally abolished, or changed to a different day. That was effected through the action of the constitutional convention, and ratified by the people in an election held for the purpose of ratifying or rejecting the new constitution. That convention having been created in pursuance of an act of the Legislature, and in accordance with the provisions of the old constitution, assembled on the 16th day of January, 1872, they were authorized by the act under which they were assembled "to discuss, consider, and propose, for ratification or rejection, a new constitution, or amendments to the old one."

Under that authority the convention proposed to the people for ratification, on the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, a new constitution, together with a schedule thereto, which provided for the holding of an election on the same day at the several places of voting in each county, for senators and members of the house of delegates, and all officers, executive, judicial, county, or district, required by the constitution to be elected by the people. That constitution was ratified, and at the same time all officers elected as proposed in the schedule.

The constitution which was ratified and went into effect on the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, contained the following provision in regard to elections thereafter to be held:

The general elections of State and county officers and members of of the Legislature shall be held on the second Tuesday of October, until otherwise provided by law.—Constitution 1872, article 4, section 7.

Now, what became of the general election appointed for the fourth Thursday of October, 1872? Nothing is clearer than that it was abolished, and with it fell all its machinery, its officers, and all regulations prescribing the times, places, or manner of holding it. And as the congressional election had no independent existence, no time, place, nor manner of holding it, and no officers to hold it, it fell with that upon which it had been made to depend.

I cannot leave this portion of my argument without entering my unqualified dissent from the reasoning of the majority of the committee—if that can be considered a majority report which has been agreed to by five out of eleven members—I cannot, I say, allow the occasion to pass without entering my dissent from the reasoning of the committee by which they endeavor to sustain the October election.

Neither the people of West Virginia, nor the contestants, nor the counsel who argued this case before the committee, ever put it upon the ground which it has finally been placed upon by the members of the committee who make the majority report. Why, sir, what is that ground? It is the new discovery that section 1 of the code of 1869 fixes the time of electing members of Congress. I say that fifteen days ago no man in Congress or out of Congress, no man on either side of this case, had ever made the discovery that the first section of the code was intended to include members of Congress. Yet that is the whole foundation nearly of this report of the committee. This is the language of that section:

SECTION 1. The general elections for State, district, county, and township officers, and members of the Legislature, shall be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

Now, I say, they have lately discovered that the term "district officers" was intended to include members of Congress. It had been admitted on all sides heretofore, that it only included the assessors who were elected in districts in West Virginia. Now, in order to sustain this, what do the committee assume? They assume, in the first place, that the term "district officers" in the first section of the code means members of Congress. But they also assume that the same word in the seventh section of the schedule does not include, but that it excludes, members of Congress. Those are the assumptions which the committee make here.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Will my colleague allow me to call his attention to the fact that the schedule expressly says that the district officers elected by this constitution shall be elected by the people?

Mr. HYDE. I was going to mention that. I was going to call attention to this part of the schedule to which the gentleman has referred, and to the plain intent and meaning of it in my judgment. The schedule, in the seventh clause, says:

On the same day, and under the superintendence of the officers who shall conduct the election for determining the ratification or rejection of the constitution and schedule, elections shall be held, at the several places of voting in each county, for senators and members of the house of delegates, and all officers, executive, judicial, county, or district, required by this constitution to be elected by the people.

Now, unquestionably, the intent of that provision was to distinguish between officers that were to be appointed and officers to be elected, and not to exclude Representatives in Congress.

[At two o'clock Mr. HYDE was interrupted by reports from the Committee on the District of Columbia, after the disposition of which he resumed and concluded his remarks, as follows:]

Mr. HYDE. When I was interrupted I had explained my reasons for thinking that if members of Congress are included in the first section of the code, they are also included in the second section of the schedule.

V. THE AUGUST ELECTION.

I now pass to the consideration of the August election.

In attempting to point out the illegality of the October election I have in part anticipated the objections to the election held on the fourth Thursday of August. And here the question recurs which is the test to which both of these elections must be subjected, that is, was it held upon the day prescribed by the Legislature of West Virginia for the election of Representatives in Congress?

Sir, to my mind, the reasoning by which it is sought to sustain the August election is fatally weak, defective, and inconclusive. It is claimed that the second section of the code of 1869, to which I have referred, by the words "at the said election," designated an occasion without any element of time. By what rule of construction such a conclusion is arrived at I am unable to state. It is admitted by all that the words refer to the general elections provided for by the constitution of West Virginia. And those general elections were fixed by that constitution as well as by the code to be held on the fourth Thursday of October.

The second section of the code provides that "at the said elections," in every alternate year, members of Congress shall be elected, meaning, as every one admits, the general election on the fourth Thursday of October. Now, by what process of construction or reasoning are we to conclude that one part of that which was clearly referred to was intended, and that another part was excluded?

When we admit that kind of reasoning, if such it can be called, to take the place of plain, legal, and settled rules of construction, the very result that has taken place in this House may be expected; gentlemen will take their choice as to what shall be included and what excluded; on the one side claiming that the words "at the said elections" refer to the fourth Thursday of October, independent of the general election; and, on the other side, that they refer to the general election, whenever held, and, of course, independent of the fourth Thursday of October. But even if we were to concede that by these words the Legislature intended that the election of Representatives should take place at the same time with the general election, we should still be very far short of establishing the validity of the August election.

This brings me to inquire more particularly into that election, its character and its purpose. And here two questions arise:

1. Was it such a general election as was contemplated by the Legislature in the second section of the code?

It is absolutely certain that it was not one of "the said elections" referred to in that section. And I think it is equally certain that it was not a general election at all in the ordinary legal acceptation of the term.

In the usual legal sense a general election is not only an election common to the whole State, and at which State officers may be elected, but it is one that is not restricted or limited to one special and particular object, and to one occasion, and never to recur or be repeated.

Was the election held in August a general election within this definition? Was it not, on the other hand, a special election, called on an extraordinary occasion for a particular and unusual purpose; and, worse than all, was it not an experimental election?

And here again, I am glad to say, there can be no dispute about the facts, because they are established by the schedule of the new constitution. It was an election appointed by the constitutional convention for the purpose of submitting to the qualified voters of the State the question of ratifying or rejecting the new constitution, and for electing all officers provided for by that constitution.

The following are the provisions upon that subject:

3. The officers authorized by existing laws to conduct general elections shall cause elections to be held at the several places of voting established by law, in each county, on the fourth Thursday of August, 1872, at which elections the votes of all persons qualified to vote, under the existing constitution, and offering to vote, shall be taken upon the question of ratifying or rejecting this constitution and schedule.

* * * * * * *

7. On the same day, and under the superintendence of the officers who shall conduct the election for determining the ratification or rejection of the constitution and schedule, elections shall be held, at the several places of voting in each county, for senators and members of the house of delegates, and all officers, executive, judicial, county, or district, required by this constitution to be elected by the people.—Schedule of Constitution of 1872, sections 3 and 7.

Even if the constitution was adopted, no election was to be again held on the annual or biennial return of that day, nor was such an election as this ever to be held in the State again.

This was an election not only to ratify the new constitution, but to elect all officers, executive, judicial, county, or district, required by the constitution to be elected by the people. This was in every sense a special election, both as to the object for which it was appointed and the time at which it was to occur. No election was ever to take place again on the same day or for the same object. As before stated, the time hereafter fixed by the new constitution for the general election is the second Tuesday in October.

2. The second question which is naturally suggested in relation to the August election is this: Even supposing it was a general election within the meaning of the second section of the code, did it have any such characteristics of legality or certainty that it could be considered as the time or occasion prescribed for the election of Representatives?

Far from it; as I before stated, it was an experimental election. Whether it resulted in anything whatever legally, whether anybody was elected, depended upon whether the new constitution was ratified. If the new constitution had been rejected by the people at that election, then the whole election for all officers would have been a failure and a farce; and the regular general election provided for by the old constitution for State officers and members of Congress would unquestionably have been held on the fourth Thursday of October.

Now, sir, granting everything else that is claimed by the advocates of the August election, namely, that the general election had been designated by the Legislature as the occasion for the congressional election, and that that occasion could be shifted to another day by the constitutional convention, and that the August election was a general election and therefore might have been the occasion of the congressional election, still there would remain the question whether the August election was in fact the prescribed time for the congressional election.

Can it be said to have been the prescribed time, that is, written before, appointed, ordained, and established beforehand, when this element of uncertainty attached to it; when it depended upon the votes which should be cast that day whether it should be a legal election at all or only a failure and a farce; when, in fact, no mortal man or tribunal could determine whether it was a legal election for any officers whatever until the sun went down and the votes were counted, and officially returned from every precinct in the State? Are we prepared to yield so much—to allow so much uncertainty in regard to congressional elections? In the face of the Constitution of the United States, which says that the time of holding the election shall be prescribed, do we propose to say that that provision has been complied with, when no man could tell until after the election whether it was the legal day for any election at all, because its legality for any purpose depended upon the vote that was to be polled?

I desire in this connection to reply to an argument which has been frequently made during the progress of this matter, and I suppose with some confidence by those who use it.

It has been affirmed that the State of West Virginia decided this question, by recognizing as duly elected all the State officers elected in August, and that it is proper to be governed by her decision, as it relates only to her own representation in this House. It seems to me there must be a great confusion of ideas on the part of those who resort to that argument. The legality of the election of State officers stands upon an entirely different ground from the election of members of Congress. If the people of West Virginia, by provisions of their supreme law or otherwise, desire to have an experimental election for State officers, I know of nothing to prevent them from doing so. But in holding an election for Representatives in Congress they are governed by the Constitution of the United States, which says that the times, places, and manner of holding such an election shall be prescribed by the Legislature. In other words, the times, places, and manner shall be fixed by law before the day of election.

The precedent.—The industry as well as the ingenuity of legal gentlemen who represented the opposing sides of this controversy have been taxed to the utmost to find precedents for maintaining the validity of these elections. The precedents that have been cited fail to do this, for the reasons that I have before stated. And I am very happy to be able to state that their efforts have been absolutely fruitless, and that no decision can be found in the history of this Government that tends in the slightest degree to establish the validity of either the August or the October election; and I sincerely hope that we are not about to make such a precedent. Precedents are disagreeable things sometimes, and sometimes they are dangerous.

Who can tell the consequences which might flow in corrupt or high party times from such a precedent as this—from a precedent which would say in effect that, instead of absolutely fixing the legality of a congressional election beforehand by prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding it, its legality may be made to depend upon a contingency, or upon the happening of an event, or the number of votes which may be cast for a certain object? If its validity may be made to depend upon the number of votes cast for a State constitution, why not upon the number cast for certain individuals?

It seems to me that under such a precedent we might have a congressional election that should be valid if certain men received a majority of votes, and to go for nothing if they were defeated.

VI. CONCLUSION.

Sir, in conclusion, I will only add, that if either the August or the October elections had been anything like a full and fair expression of the voters of West Virginia, I might feel that the rules of law ought not to be too rigidly applied; and that if we erred at all, it ought to be on the side of giving effect to that expression, by immediately admitting the chosen Representatives to seats in the House.

But when I consider the fact that out of 81,875 votes which were cast on the ratification of the constitution only 44,917 were cast for members of Congress in August in the entire State, and in October only the insignificant number of 22,146; when I consider that conventions of both political parties met and adjourned without making any nominations of candidates for Congress, for the sole reason that it was the general belief as well as the opinion of the best legal minds that no lawful day for the election had been appointed; that in the second district, in August, there were eleven counties in which not one vote was cast for members of Congress; that the election in October was considered such a farce that in the first district forty persons were voted for, and that the total vote of all only amounted to the ridiculous number of 4,099 votes; that, taken together, neither the August nor the October claimants represent anything like a majority of the voters of the State, the claimants under the August election having received but little more than one-third of the votes actually polled in August, and the claimants under the October election having received less than one-fifth of those votes—I am not prepared, by sustaining such a pretended election, to establish what I should regard as a very bad and a very dangerous precedent, in the very bad cause of practically disfranchising the people of West Virginia.

I hope, therefore, that we shall send this contest back to the people, and give them an opportunity, which they have not yet had, of holding a legal and a full and fair election for Representatives in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, when the West Virginia election cases were first stated on the argument before the Committee on Elections, I thought their determination depended entirely upon the question as to whether the convention of the State had power to repeal, alter, amend, or in any form change the statute of 1869, in so far as it related to the election of Representatives to Congress. I think so now. Let me state in general terms the provisions of that statute. I quote them from memory; and allow me to say that I do not mean to trouble the House with citations of authorities or lengthy quotations.

I shall briefly state the circumstances, with the laws and principles which in my view govern the case.

It is provided in the code that the general elections for State, county, district, and township officers shall be held on the fourth Thursday in October; and in the second section occurs the remarkable phrase, remarkable as it would seem from the debate here, that "at the said elections" there shall be elected a governor and other State officers, (naming them,) senators, members of the house of delegates, and Representatives to Congress, which is the material part. The statute further provided the manner and places of holding said elections. Did this statute prescribe, in obedience to the Constitution of the United States, the "times, places, and manner" of holding elections for Representatives to Congress? It is admitted in argument here that it did. Precedents from a number of States have been cited to show that the same language had been employed in their statutes; that they had provided that upon the occurrence of certain elections, members of Congress should be chosen; and that this phraseology did fix, did prescribe the time for the election of a Representative to Congress.

Sir, assuming that to be so upon a simple construction of the statute, the other question arises, was that statute changed, or did it remain in force on the fourth Thursday of October? If it was repealed, was it repealed in whole or in part?

As to the question of construction, it is a fundamental rule to look at the intent of the Legislature. What was that intent? It was first, in obedience to the constitution of the State of West Virginia, (and the provision of that constitution is material in this respect,) to fix the day of the election on the fourth Thursday of October for governor and other State officers as therein named; and then it was the duty, the paramount duty of that Legislature, under the national Constitution, to "prescribe"—that is the word of the Constitution; I do not mean to change it—to "prescribe" the "times, places, and manner" of holding elections for Representatives to Congress. That Legislature meant to do this, and did do it, as is admitted. Undoubtedly it was changed, repealed pro tanto as it related to State officers.

Was it changed? I would not wish to enter into a dispute with my colleagues on the committee; that is not my purpose; I wish to discharge a simple duty in submitting my views upon this case. Sir, I deny the power of a State convention to repeal or change in any manner a statute of a Legislature passed in pursuance of an obligation of the national Constitution. Perhaps, sir, the American mind has been since 1860 more particularly directed to the subject of the powers and duties of State conventions than at any former period in the history of the country. One thing at least has been settled; and that is, that whatever sovereignty may belong to such a body it cannot sever the relations of a State with the Federal Union. But more has been settled. A State cannot do any act or thing inconsistent with the national Constitution, the laws of the United States passed in pursuance of it, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States. There is the limitation upon its powers. Subject to these limitations, it is supreme—in the sense in which Junius said the British Parliament was supreme—relatively supreme, not absolutely supreme; because its authority is derived from the will of the people of the State, and that will is but a part of the will of the whole people of the United States, and is subordinate to that will.

Sir, a convention, when called according to the organic law of the State, may make or unmake State constitutions, and that, too, without submitting them to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection. It may pass ordinances having the force of statutes, and the courts will respect those ordinances as such. It may repeal or alter statutes of the Legislature pertaining to the ordinary legislation of the State, but not a statute of this kind providing, in obedience to the national Constitution, for the election of Representatives in Congress.

Having taken this view of these cases, I was not prepared to look outside of the evidence before the committee. As the cases stood there, we had this proclamation or certificate of the governor of West Virginia, to the effect that on the fourth Tuesday of August, Mr. Davis, Mr. Hereford, and Mr. Hagans received each a majority of the votes cast, and that if the House should be of opinion that that was the legal day of the election, then he certifies those gentlemen severally were elected; that on the fourth Thursday of October another election was held, at which Mr. Hereford, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Martin received a majority of the votes cast, and that if the House should be of opinion that that was the legal day of election, then he certifies that those gentlemen were duly elected. That proclamation or certificate discloses the fact that only about one-sixth of the votes cast at the August election was cast in October; and that is all the evidence we have in the case. So stand the cases before the House.

Now, sir, it was said upon the argument (by some members of the committee, who have taken that view) that because of the paucity of the vote given on the fourth Thursday of October the election should not be considered valid, but in their opinion it should be remanded to the people. It surely is not necessary to assert here that the paucity of votes can make no difference as to the validity of an election, for it has been well settled that where in other respects an election is fair, where the people have had an opportunity to vote, and there was no fraud, a single vote will make an election valid.

Let me now notice some of the objections which have been taken to the position which I have assumed. It is said that the statute of 1869 did not prescribe a time for an election, but prescribed an occasion or event. Sir, I desire always to be deferential to the opinions of others; but it seems to me that when gentlemen deny the power of a convention to change the times, places, or manner of holding an election for Representatives in Congress, and at the same time endeavor to put forth the idea that such a body can change the "occasion" or "event," it is a clear petitio principii.

If the convention of West Virginia had no power to change the time, it had no power to change the occasion or event, or to shift the occasion or event or time.

Now, sir, I asked one of the counsel before the Committee on Elections, when these cases were first opened, whether he could cite me to any precedent or authority in the history of election cases where the election for Representatives to Congress had been held by authority of a State convention, and he immediately referred me to the Oregon case, the case of Shields. I had read the case before, but I looked at it again, and, as sometimes happens in looking over authorities cited, I could find no analogy between it and other cases. This was the case of a Territory. And, under the power of Congress—not the power of the House, not of either House—to admit new States, Representatives might well, perhaps, be admitted, when the times, places, and manner of holding their elections had been prescribed by a convention constituted by that power, and their admission would be justifiable, as stated by Mr. Justice Blackstone, in the two capital exceptions of calling together the Parliament without the King's writ, on "the principle of necessity." And that is the principle upon which these cases of admissions of Representatives elected by the people of inchoate States are based. But no such authority or precedent is to be found where a State has been admitted into the Union, except in the case of the insurrectionary States. The action of the House in respect of such cases can only be justified on the same principle of necessity. Under the provisions of an ordinance of a convention of my own State, held since the rebellion, the times, places, and manner of holding elections for members of Congress were prescribed.

But this action of the convention was outside of the constitution—was extraconstitutional—and it is only to be justified on a principle of necessity. It was authorized by no power expressed or implied in the national Constitution. I shall not be one of those who doubt the validity of this action. I think Macaulay says that one of the judges of England doubted twenty years after the Convention Parliament whether he had the power to sentence one to be hanged, having received his appointment from William and Mary. It may be that some one may doubt as to the constitutionality of the reconstruction acts twenty years hence, but I will not be one of them. I will recognize them to be valid on the principle of necessity at least.

One gentleman of the committee, agreeing with the majority that the fourth Thursday of October was the legal day of election, is in favor of remanding the election to the people, and the chairman has made a motion to recommit the resolution reported, with power to send for persons and papers. In my view of the case, I cannot see any ground for that motion. I repeat, the Committee on Elections had nothing before them but a certificate of the governor of West Virginia. Mr. HEREFORD had been admitted on this certificate. There was no allegation of fraud or violence, yet the minds of some gentlemen of the committee, as was my own, seemed to be impressed that there was some equitable ground upon which the House might remand the election. No precedents are to be found heretofore except those of fraud, violence, and intimidation. Fraud, it is known, is a proper ground, because it vitiates everything it touches, either in law or equity. Violence was a proper ground, because when a portion of a district was overrun with the enemy the people did not have an opportunity to vote, and could not vote. There could not be a proper expression of their will in such case in regard to their choice of a Representative in Congress. No such case occurred. The people could vote, and they did vote without fraud or violence, so far as appeared to the committee. But if it were desirable to make a precedent in these cases, on some equitable ground other than fraud, upon what ground could it be made? No accident is alleged, and no mistake of fact. A mistake of law was made, as appears in the official certificate of the governor of the State. But a mistake in law does not in equity make a ground for relief. Such mistake excuses no one, even in criminal cases, and it ought not to establish a precedent for remanding an election to the people.

Sir, I know under the Constitution each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. There is no limitation upon that power. There is no legal discretion, nothing to control members of this House but their consciences in the use of the power. If this House should choose to admit a man under twenty-five years of age, or a foreigner, or one otherwise disqualified, there is no power under the Constitution to prevent it. I do not mean to say that I think this House capable of doing such a thing, nor would I make a statement which would justify the inference that I think the House capable of doing any such thing. But I desire to answer remarks which were made by one of my colleagues on the committee, to the effect that political feeling or bias of public opinion had something to do with the opinions of this committee. Happily for me, perhaps, I am a republican, and the gentlemen, so far as is now known to me, in whose favor the resolutions were reported, are democrats. No suspicion of political feeling, then, can be attached to my motives. I disclaim all considerations of that sort. An election case is not a party matter. If any party spirit controls others in these West Virginia cases it does not control me. And I am unconscious of any bias of public opinion.

I have made these observations, Mr. Speaker, simply in the discharge of a plain public duty; and having done so I am content to let the case go for the decision of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was communicated to the House by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 241) to confirm the title to certain lands in the Fort Kearney military reservation, in Fremont County, Iowa;

A bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and

A bill (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State of Rhode Island a certain gun.

EXPENSE OF COLLECTING CUSTOMS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask to be permitted for a moment to interrupt the discussion on the election case for the purpose of offering for reference a resolution of inquiry to facilitate the business of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is desirable that all expenditures of the Government shall, as far as practicable, be made in pursuance of annual appropriations made by Congress after a full exhibit of the necessity for the same: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws relating to the expenses of collecting customs duties as to fix the number and rate of compensation of all persons employed in that branch of the service, and to require that said expenses be provided for by appropriations made annually on estimates submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. RANDALL. Should not this be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service?

Mr. GARFIELD. It needs to go to the Committee on Ways and Means, as they have charge of the whole matter.

Mr. RANDALL. I am afraid that the Committee on Ways and Means have so much to do that we will never have a report from that committee on this matter of reduction of expenses.

Mr. GARFIELD. They have begun this work already.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEST VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections in reference to the West Virginia contested-election cases.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, after a careful examination of this case, I have come to the conclusion that neither of the elections—neither that in August nor that in October—was legally held, and that neither was valid. I say after a careful examination; and I will do my colleagues on the committee the justice to say that they have given the subject the fullest consideration, and although they have differed widely and presented a very anomalous state of things in regard to the conclusions at which they have arrived, yet I believe I can say for all my colleagues that they have honestly and impartially looked into the question. I have said that there is an anomalous condition of things here presented; because we have what is called a majority report in favor of sustaining the October election, while one member of the committee signing the majority report dissents from the conclusions to which the committee have arrived, and gives his opinion, that although the election in October was held on the day prescribed by law, yet the circumstances are such that that election ought not to be validated; that the persons elected under it ought not to be admitted on the floor of this House. So, that being the case, there is really, in point of fact, no majority report. We have another section of the committee who are of the opinion that the election held in August was the valid election, that it was held on the day prescribed by law for the holding of elections of members of Congress. And still another portion of the committee holding that neither election was valid.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in reference to this August election, we must look to the authority contained in the act of the Legislature of West Virginia as the only authority on which this August election can be maintained. The Constitution of the United States having provided that the Legislatures should prescribe "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives" in Congress, no other power save the legislative department of the State, no other department of the State government, can prescribe the times, or places, or manner of holding elections for members of Congress. Now, sir, it is contended that this election held in the month of August, held under the authority of a provision in the schedule of the constitution of the State of West Virginia, was a valid election. And in order to get the benefit of the argument that it was authorized by the Legislature of West Virginia, that it was held in pursuance of a provision of an act of the Legislature of West Virginia, it is said that by some means, when the schedule was adopted fixing the 22d of August as the time for holding elections to be held under the constitution of West Virginia—that by some means that operated as an amendment to the act of 1869, the only act under which an election for Representatives in Congress could have been held.

I call the attention of this House to the fact that that provision in the schedule to the constitution looking to an election in August was evidently a provision on its face intended to provide an occasion when the votes should be taken on the ratification or rejection of the constitution and for electing the officers named in the schedule, with a view to putting the machinery of the State government into operation under that constitution. I call the attention of the House to the fact, that while that is plainly expressed upon the face of the schedule to the constitution, in section 7, and while in the very nature of things that must have been the object, and the sole object, of providing by the schedule for an election, there is no provision in it for an election for members of Congress. If the validity of the election in August depends alone upon the provision of the schedule, the argument will not hold; because those who pretend that the election in August was a valid election must find some warrant in the act of the Legislature of West Virginia before that election could be valid.

Was the election held in August, under the operation of that provision of the schedule, a general election? It had no single element of a general election, except that in reference to the officers who had to be elected on that occasion in the event of the constitution being ratified, a vote was to be taken throughout the State. I candidly confess that in that respect it had one element of a general election.

But, Mr. Speaker, the election of August, 1872, was never to be held in August of any other year. It was to occur, as I have said, for the express purpose of having a vote on the question of the ratification or rejection of the constitution, and for the purpose of electing the officers named in that schedule, and who should go into office in the event of that amended constitution being adopted. If the amendment to the constitution had not been adopted, if the vote of the people in August had been against the ratification of the amended constitution, then, of course, those officers elected under the new constitution of the State of West Virginia would not have entered upon the duties of those offices, and the election would have amounted to nothing.

Now that election was for the purpose I have named—for the special purpose I have named. And an election in August was not to occur, as I have said, in any other year except the year 1872. I at first thought that the provision in the constitution looking to a general election on the second Tuesday in October had a different meaning from what, after a more careful examination, I concluded it did have. The House will remember, or those who have listened to the discussion of this question, that the convention which assembled in July, 1872, incorporated this provision in the new constitution:

The general election for State and county officers shall be held on the second Tuesday in October until otherwise prescribed by law.

Now I understand, to some extent, the powers of a constitutional convention. I do not deem it necessary to argue the point, but I should not say that if the Legislature of West Virginia had passed a separate act providing for the time, places, and manner of holding the election for Representatives in Congress, and had inserted no provision in that act with reference to the election of State and county officers, the constitutional convention could, by an express provision in the constitution repealing the act of the Legislature, do that thing. But I say that in the case we are considering we by no means have any such question presented.

It is admitted on all hands that the act of 1869 was the only act of the Legislature in force in the State of West Virginia providing for the election of members of Congress when the constitutional convention met. It is admitted on all hands that that act was in full force until the ratification of the amendments to the constitution. But when those amendments were ratified, on the 22d of August, 1872, what was the effect of any provision in the new constitution of that State which was repugnant to the provisions of the act of 1869?

If the provisions of the act of 1869, providing for a general election on the fourth Thursday in October, were repugnant to the provisions of the constitution providing for a general election on the second Thursday in October, I submit whether the act of the Legislature in that respect did not fall to the ground. I submit whether the constitutional provision did not, ex vi termini, repeal the statute in that regard.

Now, while in my judgment no such provision was necessary, as the result would follow any way, yet the fact is that the new constitution of the State of West Virginia has, in express terms, provided that laws not repugnant to the provisions of that constitution should remain in force; with the corollary, of course, that if any laws were repugnant to the provisions of this constitution they should fall to the ground, they should be repealed.

Now, was this provision of the constitution of West Virginia, that a general election should be held on the second Tuesday in October, repugnant to the provision of the act of 1869, which said that a general election should be held on the fourth Thursday in October? Can there be any doubt on that point? If these provisions were repugnant to each other the constitutional provision went into force and effect on the 22d day of August, 1872, when the new constitution was ratified. And from that day, and from the first hour of that day, the constitutional provision for a general election on the second Thursday in October was in full force and effect.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has argued that the provision in the schedule amended the act of 1869. Let me remind him of the fact that the schedule had performed its office when the election in August had been held, and when the constitution was ratified on that day. That schedule was prepared for the purpose of putting in operation in the State the machinery of the new State government, and that the provision for the election in August was not a provision for a general election.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would ask the gentleman if there was any general election in West Virginia in 1872 for State, county, and district officers?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then allow me to ask another question.

Mr. HARRISON. Not just yet. Let me answer the question you have already asked. I say there was no general election in West Virginia in 1872, for the very reason that a special election had been provided by the constitution to be held in August for the election of all the State officers to be elected by the people under that constitution.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then, as Representatives in Congress could only be elected at a general election, was there any provision at all for the election of Representatives in Congress? It certainly is not to be presumed that the Legislature and the constitutional convention would leave a State without any provision on the subject. We are bound to presume that the law provided for an election.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, no strained or forced construction of the provisions of the constitution, based upon the idea that the presumption must be that the people intended there should be an election for members of Congress in that year, can sustain the position that the schedule provision had any effect whatever upon the act of 1869. After a careful examination of the question, my impression is that there was no election in that State in the year 1872 for members of Congress—none that could have been legally held. Let me state my reasons for coming to this conclusion. The organic and statute laws were in such confusion in reference to that particular question, that there was an uncertainty in the public mind, an uncertainty in the estimation of judges of law in that State, which arose from an inherent defect in the law, resulting from the action of the convention, and a failure on the part of the Legislature of that State to provide by law for an election for members of Congress in such a way as to make the question plain, and authorize an election in the year 1872.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the provisions of the schedule to the amendments of the constitution were in no sense repugnant to the provisions of the act of 1869. Both can remain in full force. The provision of the schedule was for a special election to test the sense of the people of West Virginia upon the ratification or rejection of the amendments of the constitution and for the election of the officers who were first to be elected under that constitution. This was a special election, because it grew out of an exigency; it grew out of the fact that the constitutional convention had met; that it had adopted a new constitution for West Virginia; and out of the necessity that officers should be elected under that constitution, should take the oath to support that constitution, and should come into office with a view to carrying out the purposes of the people as expressed in this amended constitution. This could be done in perfect consistency with the provisions of the act of 1869, because there was nothing in that act that interfered in the slightest degree with the holding of the special election. But when we come to discuss the question whether the August election was valid, we must, in order to sustain it, find some warrant for it in an act of the Legislature, because the Constitution of the United States provided that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections" for Representatives in Congress should be "prescribed" by the Legislature. I have failed to see any ground for even a strained construction or implication which would show that the act of 1869 was altered or amended in the slightest degree by the provisions of the schedule under which this special election in August was held.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the question whether the October elections were valid. It is to be regretted, seriously regretted, that the people of West Virginia left the question in the shape in which they have left it. It is their fault, not ours. It is to be regretted that, when the constitutional convention was considering the question as to when general elections should be held, and when it must have been seen that there was some confusion growing out of the provision for general elections, with reference to its operation upon the act of 1869, the difficulty was not remedied even though it had been necessary to have a called session of the Legislature. But we know as a fact (and I desire to call attention to the fact in general terms, because I do not care to go into figures or details) that there were two elections held under circumstances showing that the people were uncertain as to which was the day for holding elections for members of Congress, and thus showing that there was a radical defect in the provisions of law on the subject.

I am free to say that if there had been no election for members of Congress at the special election in August, and if the people had gone on upon the fourth Thursday of October and elected Representatives in Congress, conceding the fact among themselves that that was the day, and showing that fact by a vote equal to the vote ordinarily cast for members of Congress, I should not have been inclined to disturb the October election, although I might have thought, as a question of law, that it was not authorized.

But that is not the state of facts presented to us now. A special election was held in the month of August, 1872, at which the people of West Virginia polled something like 80,000 votes upon the question of the ratification or rejection of amendments that were submitted to them. At the same election only 46,000 votes were cast for members of Congress.

The fact of itself would show that the people were not satisfied that that was the proper time for the congressional election, because we find that of 80,000 qualified electors who cast their votes upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution, more than 30,000 abstained from voting, refrained from participating in the election, for members of Congress.

Mr. LAMAR. Thirty-six thousand nine hundred and fifty.

Mr. HARRISON. I am informed by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] that 36,950 voters who went to the polls abstained from voting for members of Congress. This shows very great doubt in the minds of the people; and, more than that, it shows that there was not a fair, full, free expression of the wishes of the people in that election.

But how was it in regard to the October election? Why, sir, after this election had been held in August—improperly held for members of Congress, because of the fact that it was not warranted by any act of the Legislature of West Virginia—it was pretended that the fourth Thursday of October was the day for holding the election, because the act of the Legislature had prescribed that the general election should be held on the fourth Thursday of October; and the act of 1869, by the second section, had prescribed that at "said election" an election should be held for members of Congress.

Persons disregarded entirely the fact that the constitutional provision changed the time of holding the general election as provided in the first section of the act of 1869, and went into an election for members of Congress on the fourth Thursday of October, because that was the time authorized by the act of 1869, notwithstanding that act had been repealed by the constitutional provision fixing the general election for another day. What was the result of that election? Can any man, taking the result of that election, and the number of votes cast at that election, as I am told only about one-seventh of the voters qualified to vote for members of Congress—can any man say that was a fair, full, free expression of the wishes of the people of West Virginia, to say nothing about the law question? I think not.

I would not be understood as contending, Mr. Speaker, that mere paucity in numbers, mere paucity in the vote, would invalidate an election in the absence of fraud, or in the absence of such circumstances as would amount to the same thing as fraud. So far as this election in October is concerned, I have no hesitancy in saying it operated as a fraud on the people of the State of West Virginia. It had that effect. What else could be its effect, when, after an election had been held at which a much larger vote was cast for members of Congress, a portion of the electors went on and cast a very small vote at this October election, which must have resulted from the fact there was doubt and uncertainty as to which was the legal day for the election? And while, as I said, I will not be understood as saying that in a full, fair, and free election, where every elector had an opportunity to vote, a small number voting would invalidate the election, yet I say the fact that a very small number did vote in this October election, taken in connection with the fact there had been another election held, and that there was uncertainty as to the statute in reference to the time for holding the election, amounts to the same thing as a positive fraud on the people of West Virginia.

The representatives of West Virginia, assembled in convention, charged with the duty, vested with the power, of amending the constitution of that State, provided solemnly that the general election should be held, until otherwise prescribed by law, on the second Tuesday of October. It could not have been intended that the general elections for 1872 should be held on the second Tuesday of October, for the simple reason that the people had provided for a special election at which all the officers provided by the amended constitution to be elected by the people in that State were to be elected; and it cannot be presumed they intended there should be another election—and that a general election—in sixty days after the special election, when the special election was held to accomplish the same result. The vote of the people in August ratified the constitution and elected all the officers required to be elected under that constitution; and that being done, I say it is not to be presumed the convention intended or desired there should be another election held in 1872. But the provision of the constitution requiring general elections to be held on the second Tuesday of October is in force. It went into force whenever the constitution was ratified. It operated to repeal every provision of the act of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia providing for elections on the fourth Thursday in October; and gentlemen cannot get from under the force and effect of the proposition that the constitution did repeal the act of 1869 so far as the time for holding the general elections is concerned.

Mr. LAMAR. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether his construction of the code does not make it in fact prescribe that there shall be an election of a Representative in Congress for each congressional district in the year 1872—in 1870, and every second year thereafter?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAMAR. Then if the new constitution of West Virginia prescribes, as I understood you to construe it, there shall be no election in 1872, does not the constitution abrogate the statutory provision? Is that your position?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir. I stated, Mr. Speaker, if there had been an act of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, standing by itself, it may be that no provision of the constitution of West Virginia would repeal that statute, because if the makers of the State constitution had undertaken to repeal a statute which looked to the election of members of Congress, and for no other purpose, it might bring that action of the convention within the category of operating to repeal what the national Constitution had declared should be done by the Legislature. However that question would be, if that had been the case, here is a different case entirely.

The first section of the act of the Legislature provided that a general election for State, county, district, and township officers should be holden on the first Thursday in October in each and every year. And the second section of the act provided that at said election there should be elected certain officers under the State government, mentioning what officers should be elected, including members of Congress. Now, I say that when the constitution provided that the general election should be held on the second Tuesday of October, unless otherwise prescribed by law, there was no provision of law when that constitution went into effect which authorized any election on the fourth Thursday of October; and as the constitution had repealed the act authorizing the general election on the fourth Thursday of October, the second section of the act went with it, because it was not an independent provision, but was dependent for force and validity upon the preceding section and was intimately linked and leagued with the provision for the general election. And as this second section of the act was dependent on the first section of the act for its validity, especially as the second section of the act provided that certain things should be done "at the said election," coupling it with the time and the place, the provision in the last clause of the second section went under, was repealed, abrogated, annulled, because of the fact that the constitution had repealed the first section of the act. That is my position.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have but a word more to say. I am thoroughly convinced that upon no grounds whatever can we be justified in sustaining the August election unless we come to the conclusion that that election was a general election, and that there was such a provision for the general election as would amend the act of 1869 so as to make that first section read the fourth Thursday in August instead of the fourth Thursday in October. If we can do that, if we can come to the conclusion that that was a general election, that that provision in the schedule actually amended the act of 1869 so as to provide for an election in August, then we can admit those elected at the August election, but not otherwise.

But in relation to the October election there can be no pretense that that election was valid, unless we are of the opinion that the convention had no power whatever to operate upon that statute to the extent of repealing the provision for a general election on the fourth Thursday of October. For, unless we come to the conclusion that even after the repeal of the first section of the act of 1869, and providing a different day for the general election, the last clause in the second section of the act stands alone in its own vigor, untouched, unrepealed, unmodified, by the positive provision of the constitution, the validity of the October election cannot be maintained. This provision of the constitution, providing for an election on the second Tuesday of October, must mean something, and it is admitted by the gentlemen who have discussed this question that hereafter the election of State officers will be held on the second Tuesday of October. Never again until another constitutional convention meets will there be an election for all the officers in the State in August. Never again until another constitutional convention meets, or until the provision for holding general elections on the second Tuesday of October is repealed by law, will there be an election on the fourth Thursday of October. It will hereafter be on the second Tuesday of October until otherwise prescribed by law. That is admitted on all hands. The object of the convention in adopting that provision was to fix that day as the time for the general election. In doing so they abrogated and annulled the provisions of the act of 1869. And I submit to you whether, that being done, there is enough left in the second section of the act of 1869 to sustain the election for members of Congress; especially in view of the fact that there is such doubt and uncertainty in the minds of the people of West Virginia as to cause more than thirty thousand of the electors to abstain from voting in August, when they were at the polls, and as to cause nearly the entire number, six-sevenths of them, to abstain from participating in a so-called election in the month of October.

Mr. CROSSLAND obtained the floor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Kentucky [Mr. CROSSLAND] does not particularly desire to go on this evening, I would suggest that it would be well to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection; and the House proceeded to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 85) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1799, and also of an act entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID BRADEN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of David Braden; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIAN WAR OF 1862.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 29) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces of the Indian war of 1862: which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BUSTS OF CHIEF JUSTICES TANEY AND CHASE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 61) providing for busts of the late Chief Justices Roger Brooke Taney and Salmon Portland Chase, to be placed in the Supreme Court Room of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MAYNARD. If in order, I call for the reading of the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill providing for busts of the late Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney and of Salmon Portland Chase to be placed in the Supreme Court Room of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Joint Committee of the two Houses of Congress on the Library be, and they are hereby, authorized to procure and place in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States busts of the late Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney and of the late Salmon Portland Chase.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying this act into effect the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MONROE. I ask that this bill be put upon its passage at this time. I have to state in regard to it simply that it was considered by the Joint Committee on the Library of the two Houses of Congress, and was unanimously agreed to by the Joint Committee.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order that the bill contains an appropriation, and under the rule must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope that when we are trying to do a decent and graceful thing we will do it decently and gracefully. There is more in the manner of doing it than in doing it; and unless we can do it in a manner which will be graceful and comely, we had better not do it at all.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from Tennessee will please attend to his own official duties and leave me to attend to mine.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts will attend to his business, and the "gentleman from Tennessee" will attend to his; and his business is to do exactly what he thinks proper to do in such an emergency.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, it having been raised.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole.

PLEASURE-YACHT FEARLESS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 216, to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AGED AND INFIRM SETTLERS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 21, for the relief of aged and infirm settlers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLMENT AND LICENSE OF CERTAIN VESSELS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 191, to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MONUMENT TO CHEVALIER DE TOURNAY.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 194, in relation to a monument erected to the memory of Chevalier de Tournay; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EAMES. I ask that that bill be put upon its passage now.

The bill was read. It provides that the sum of $800, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of repairing and protecting from decay the monument erected at Newport, Rhode Island, to the memory of Chevalier de Tournay, commander of the French naval forces in aid of the American Revolution in 1780, the money hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This bill contains an appropriation.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is exactly in the category of the other, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole.

DUTIES AND INTERNAL TAXES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 24, to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1873; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 360, making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and plans for improving the same; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. PLATT, of Virginia] spoke to the Chair in regard to this bill and claimed that it belonged to his committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is an appropriation of money in it; I do not care particularly about it being referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The fact that a bill contains an appropriation of money does not thereby imply that it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is true. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. Ought not all these bills to have a report from some committee of the House? No proper examination is secured by referring them to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I will move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, and the House can then judge to which committee it should be referred.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives, in procuring a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds, and the employment of Frederick Law Olmsted, of New York, in furnishing plans for laying out, improving, and inclosing the same.

Mr. GARFIELD. The language of the bill itself indicates that it should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The rule that requires all general appropriation bills to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations gives to that committee a great control over the business of the House; for that committee alone has the right to report at any time on the subject of such appropriation bills. The fact that a bill contains an appropriation of money, either large or small, does not of itself imply that it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

URIAH PORTER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 193) for the benefit of Uriah Porter; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

FORT KEARNEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 241) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney military reservation, in Fremont County, Iowa; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have a bill just like this now before the Committee on the Public Lands, and will be prepared to report it soon.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I will not object.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STANDEFORD. I ask that the bill be referred to a special committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. This subject has been before the Committee on Commerce for several years past.

Mr. STANDEFORD. The commerce of our western country has been taxed long enough to maintain the Louisville and Portland Canal, and it is time this question should be settled. I would therefore like to have the bill referred to a special committee, with authority to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. That proposition can be moved as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. STANDEFORD. I move that amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANDEFORD] is not satisfied with the Committee on Commerce, the bill had better be referred to some other standing committee—for instance the Committee on Railways and Canals. It seems to me there is great objection to having a special committee on this subject.

Mr. STANDEFORD. About one-tenth of the commerce of our western country passes over the Ohio River, and it is taxed in passing through this canal. This is therefore a question of vital importance to the people of my section; and on their behalf I ask that this bill may be referred to a special committee in order that it may be promptly reported and passed by this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky will reflect for a moment he will see the propriety of referring this bill to the Committee on Commerce. As far back as the first session of the last Congress, the Committee on Commerce considered the subject; and at the last session they framed legislation which they thought would be effectual. A defect, however, was afterward discovered in that enactment.

The gentleman from Kentucky is not more interested in this subject than are gentlemen upon the Committee on Commerce; and as the subject is well understood by that committee, and has heretofore been under their control, I hope the bill will be so referred.

Mr. STANDEFORD. As I understand the Committee on Commerce is friendly to this bill, I withdraw my objection.

The motion of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RHODE ISLAND LIGHT ARTILLERY.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EAMES. I ask that this bill be put on its passage now.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of the State of Rhode Island a certain gun marked "Battery B, First Rhode Island Light Artillery, Battle of Gettysburgh," for the purpose of being placed among the archives of that State.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not know anything about this bill; but I think it had better be referred.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does not this bill make an appropriation, and must it not go to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The bill does contain an appropriation of public property, and according to the new rule would be required to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not make the point; I merely wanted a construction of the rule.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the bill should properly go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make that motion.

Mr. EAMES. I will not object if the motion is insisted upon.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. DONNAN. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution for printing five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Railways and Canals relative to the regulation of commerce among the States by railroads, have directed me to report back the resolution with a recommendation that it pass.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The resolution was agreed to.

CUSTOM-HOUSE EMPLOYÉS, ETC.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, which is designed to aid the Committee on Appropriations in the preparation of their bills:

Whereas it is desirable that all expenditures of the Government shall, as far as practicable, be made in pursuance of annual appropriations made by Congress after a full exhibit of the necessity for the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws relating to the expenses of collecting customs duties as to fix the number and rate of compensation of all persons employed in that branch of the service, and to require that said expenses be provided for by appropriations made annually on estimates submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. TODD. I object.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suggest that the resolution should go to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

STURGEON BAY AND LAKE MICHIGAN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a report in relation to the extension of the time for the completion of the Sturgeon Bay, Green Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

CLAIM OF THE CHOCTAW NATION.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the memorial of P. P. Pitchlynn, delegate of the Choctaw Nation of Indians, upon the right of that nation to be paid the money awarded to it by the United States Senate, April 9, 1859; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1407) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation in the United States;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the various votes by which bills, reports, &c., have been referred or recommitted to-day; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move that the House now adjourn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. At the session to-morrow, which will be as in Committee of the Whole, no business to be transacted, the gentleman from New York, Mr. MERRIAM, will act as Speaker pro tempore.

The motion of Mr. COX was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers, were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. AVERILL: The petition of citizens of Du Luth, Minnesota, for an appropriation to repair the breakwater in the harbor of Du Luth, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Ann Henry, guardian of Mary Spriggs, minor child of Benjamin F. Spriggs, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of David Hicks, for compensation as wagon-master of the Fourth Ohio Regiment, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of Mary A. Conkin, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Eleanor Crawford, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Nancy Crawford, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Sarah Dukes, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Rebecca English, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Elijah Kilday, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Mary Mitchell, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Rebecca Yokely, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Mary Cameron, daughter of Joseph Cameron, who served sixty-six years in the United States Army, for relief, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COBB, of Kansas: The petition of J. H. Ortman and others, route-agents in the mail service of the United States, for increase of compensation, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. FRYE: The petition of Stephen P. Benton, for relief, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

Also, remonstrance of the Board of Trade, Portland, Maine, against the repeal of the bankrupt law, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HALE, of New York: The memorial of Joseph L. Pearson, Gibson Brothers, and others, employing printers of Washington, District of Columbia, in relation to the practice of printing all the records certified from the circuit courts at the public expense, whether the United States be a party to the suit or not, and the execution of other work of a private character at the Government Printing Office, to the great injury of printers, not only of Washington, but of the whole Union, to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. HANCOCK: The petition of Stanley Cooper and Sarah Cooper, his wife, for compensation for the occupation and destruction of property in Texas by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of Charles Nordhausen, of Texas, for compensation for cotton seized and teams taken by the United States Army, at Brownsville, Texas, in 1863, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, the petition of Nancy W. Bean, for compensation for the use of property by the United States in the construction of Fort Richardson, in Texas, and for the destruction of other property by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HUNTER: The petition of Charles McCarty, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of citizens of Winchester, Virginia, for the erection of a post-office building in Winchester, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HURLBUT: The petition of E. B. Gilbert and others, citizens of Illinois, for an increase of pensions to soldiers of the war of 1812, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. KILLINGER: Several petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduces the duties on manufactured cottons, woolens, iron, and other staple commodities 10 per cent, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NEGLEY: Several petitions of citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of Jane Hiland, guardian of the minor child of John Myers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of Henry G. Tyson, one of the heirs of the estate of Seth Russell, praying for the payment of the French spoliation claims, to the Committtee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ROBBINS: The petition of citizens of Rowan County, North Carolina, for certain modifications in the postal laws, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio: The petition of M. L. Mooney, Shaw Brothers, and L. L. Benson, druggists, of Cardington, Ohio, for the repeal of the stamp tax on medicines, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: The petition of John H. Ehlers and others, citizens of DeKalb County, Indiana, for the repeal of the stamp tax on medicinal preparations, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The memorial of Napoleon Collins, commodore United States Navy, in favor of the distribution among the officers and crew of the United States steamer Wachusett, of the value of the rebel pirate Florida, captured in the bay of Bahia, Brazil, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: The petition of R. D. Ruffin, for compensation for stores taken by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STANARD: The memorial of the Union Merchants, Exchange of Saint Louis, representing the necessities of the people of the Mississippi Valley, in respect to the transportation of their products and the improvement of their natural channels of commerce, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. STARKWEATHER: The petition of Eunice Christie, of Ledyard, Connecticut, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STORM: The petition of George Dayspring, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TYNER: The petition of business men of Peru, Indiana, for an increase of currency, and such amendments of the laws as will authorize free national banking, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. VANCE: A paper relating to the claim of J. M. Roane for supplies furnished the Indian service in California between the years 1856 and 1860, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts: The petition of H. O. Houghton and others, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, representing that a restoration of the duty on tea and coffee, or a revival or increase of internal taxes would be oppressive and burdensome, but recommending a repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduces duties on manufactured cottons, woolens, iron, paper, and other staple commodities 10 per cent., to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ——: The memorial of James Rea, late United States consul at Belfast, praying relief from losses sustained in the discharge of his official duties, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 24, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

On motion of Mr. BECK the reading of the Journal of yesterday was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. MERRIAM in the chair.) The House meets to-day as in Committee of the Whole, for debate only; no business whatever to be transacted.

FINANCE.

Mr. BUNDY. Mr. Speaker, not having any written speech, and in fact having had no time to write one, I do not know how much time I may occupy in the discussion of a subject of more interest than anything else to the House just now. No subject commands so large a share of public consideration, and about which there are so many shades of opinion, as the general subject of the finances in this country. There are almost as many theories for its adjustment and settlement as there are members of this House. And therefore it is to be expected that I shall be in full accord with perhaps but a very few gentlemen here.

According to certain financial writers on the subject, there is only one view to be taken. The assertion made by their followers is that we have but one currency, or we ought to have but one; that gold and silver constitute the currency of the world, and therefore that it is the duty of the Government of the United States, by appropriate legislation, as rapidly as possible, and without regard to the effect upon the great interests of the masses, to get back to what is called the world's currency; and the road by which they intend to reach it is through contraction.

I propose for a short time to consider what the currency of the country, or of the world, if you please, is. I am not unmindful of the fact that the books are full of disquisitions on this subject. And they all tend in a certain direction, and that is toward specie. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the people of the United States ought not to be asked, and we should not be compelled, to adopt the theory of any government or any people who have gone before us, unless that theory should be specially applicable and should be the best for us if adopted. The sovereign power of the country in establishing by law what shall be the currency of the country is the Federal Government. That power has acted. It has interdicted all the States, and prevented all the States by one means or another, from furnishing any part of the currency for the people of this country. It has taxed out of existence all the State banks, so far as power to issue paper money is concerned. Owing to the peculiar circumstances by which it was surrounded at the time, it is declared that there is a certain description of paper money which shall be the recognized lawful currency of the country, clothing it with the attribute which distinguishes it from all other paper issues, that of "legal tender."

I do not understand there is any prevailing disposition on the part of any considerable portion of our people to get rid in any form of that currency. The same power has established by legislation that which constitutes a dual system of currency, one the United States notes, and the other the national-bank notes, and it has provided that these national-bank notes may be and shall be redeemable in the legal-tender notes. Now, one of the main things to be accomplished in this direction by the Government has been effected; that is, whatever the national circulation shall be, it shall be of such quality as to entitle it to universal circulation, and have uniform value throughout the country. Now, sir, two things, therefore, have been accomplished: one is that the sovereign power of the country has determined what the circulating medium in the United States shall be, and the same power has clothed it with such attributes that it has a uniform value all over the country; and in these particulars no government has been more fortunate in providing for its people a currency of such value and stability for so long a period.

The remaining question, so far as that feature of the subject to be discussed is concerned, is as to its quantity; and here, perhaps, is the only debatable question that is connected with it. It is affirmed on the part of the contractionists that we not only have a sufficient quantity but that we have a redundancy. Now, I take it that there are two modes by which we can determine, and by which the people themselves can determine, as to the proper condition of this branch of the question. The first is by comparison; a comparison instituted as to the quantity of the currency or the circulating medium of this country established by law, and that provided by other governments for their people. The country that we have, perhaps, more to do with in a commercial sense than any other on the globe is Great Britain; and in the solution of this branch of the question it is but natural that we should look and see what she has done in the way of providing capital and currency for her people. In looking at that, sir, we find that she has a circulation of $300,000,000 in round numbers, and she has a population to be accommodated with that circulation of thirty-two million people. But that does not constitute her only banking capital; because here is a distinction between currency and capital. Her banking capital is not six hundred millions, but it is virtually thirty-five hundred millions; because the deposits in the banks of Great Britain constitute her banking capital as much as her gold and silver do. The deposits in the banks of our country constitute a part of our bank capital, and the capacity of the banks to loan or to discount is determined by the quantity of their deposits as much as by their capital, including their circulation.

Now let us see how we compare. Great Britain, having a circulation of six hundred millions and thirty million people, has an aggregate deposit of twenty-nine hundred millions in her banks. Put the two together and they make the aggregate $3,500,000,000. Her bank reserve for that large amount is only $116,000,000, or less than 4 per cent. of the whole sum. Taking the reserve out that has to be kept in the bank, as such, just as we keep our reserves in the banks as provided by our law, it still leaves her with an absolute banking capital, including circulation, that is available for the purpose of accommodating those who want discounts as our people do, a gross sum of more than $3,300,000,000 for thirty-two million people, or over $105 for every man, woman, and child in the kingdom of Great Britain.

Now let us see where we stand. We have an authorized circulation perhaps, in its various forms, including fractional currency, of about $756,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the true amount of our circulating medium; because since it was issued by the banks and the Government there has been an absolute destruction in the paper money of the country amounting, I presume, to 10 per cent. or thereabouts. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, instead of having seven hundred and fifty-six millions of authorized circulation, we only have about seven hundred millions. Of that seven hundred millions there are more than one hundred millions constantly idle in the sub-treasuries of the country. That reduces it to six hundred millions. Of that amount there are twenty to forty millions in the State treasuries of the various States and the municipal corporations of the States of the Union. And there are one hundred and thirty-eight to one hundred and fifty millions constantly held, I believe, by the banks as reserve. Now where do you stand with your circulation? Why, sir, you have not $500,000,000 to-day that can be called the currency of the country for the purpose of making its exchanges.

But let us go to the question of deposits and see what the facts are. Instead of twenty-nine hundred millions in the various banking institutions of the country as deposits, you have only six hundred and sixty-four millions. Put your circulation as you have it, only that which is made available for the purpose of making exchanges in this vast country, and the deposits together, and you have not eleven hundred millions in a population of forty million people scattered over the continent. While Great Britain has one hundred and five dollars of banking capital and currency for every man, woman, and child in the country, the United States have but twenty-seven dollars. I submit, Mr. Speaker, whether that is sufficient for the vast and increasing business of this country.

I know very well that the contractionists, who are desirous of getting back to what they call specie payments, burlesque our ideas here, saying we are in favor of an indefinite inflation of the currency. No such thing, sir. But as I understand it—I speak for myself and nobody else—I am in favor of such an inflation of the currency of this country and putting it on such a basis as that we shall have a reasonable amount per capita to do the business of this vast country upon, and have that so diversified and diffused as that the people of all sections of this country, from north to south and from east to west, shall have their pro rata.

Well, then, when we make this comparison, the argument of the contractionists seems to fail. But then they instance France. France, with her seven hundred millions of circulation, it is said, has an abundance of currency for her people. They speak in eulogistic terms of its character because it is so nearly abreast with gold. Why, Mr. Speaker, if the wisdom of this country, financially, could be concentrated and crystallized as that of the French, how long would it be until our currency would be abreast with gold? Could we adopt a policy in this House, and by legislation enforce it, that would bring this country one hundred and twenty millions of gold annually more than we export from it, how long do you expect, on the principle of the old law of supply and demand, which governs prices and which also, by the way, fixes the rates of interest in this country—how long would it be before our greenback would command a dollar in gold? Instead of importing more gold than we exported during the last decade, our exports of the precious metals have exceeded our imports more than five hundred and twenty-six millions, the balance of trade, exclusive of precious metals, against us reaching the enormous sum of nearly three hundred and seventy-six millions, the latter sum being paid to foreign countries in the bonds of the Government and other money obligations. How can we ever reach specie payments with such a drain upon us to pay for foreign merchandise?

Why, sir, these gentlemen are so much in favor of contracting the currency of the country and getting back to gold and silver that they characterize a greenback (our national currency) as having the mark of Cain upon it. It goes out among our people branded, they say. Ah, Mr. Speaker, it may be branded; but if it is, then they had better think of the parallel they are invoking here. Let them remember that the mark was put upon Cain by the Almighty in order to prevent the slayer from taking his life, and vengeance sevenfold was denounced upon him who should destroy him. Take care that, in thus branding our currency, you are not incurring the same penalty that was denounced against the destroyer of Cain by contributing to its destruction.

Mr. Speaker, who is it that does more than any other class of people in this country to depreciate the value of our paper money; who has done it? Why, sir, in the first place it is the Government that put it forth, and made an unfair and unhallowed distinction between the promise of the Government to pay a dollar and a gold dollar. And that depreciation is intensified by those who speak in such contemptuous terms of it. Some of them are the law-makers of the country, too. It is said that it is a very mean bird that fouls its own nest. But how much more ineffably mean is the one that does it and then brags of the achievement!

Now one of the arguments of these gentlemen, and the strong reason they give, why we should have a contraction of the currency, is because of the law of 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit." Ah, that was a legislative abortion, brought in here a monster, sent forth before its time into this breathing world half made up. Strengthen the public credit by the legislation that puts this brand of Cain upon its circulating medium! Why, what is the public credit? In this case it is nothing more nor less than the aggregate of the credit of the forty million people of this country, backed by a property worth $32,000,000,000. Strengthen the public credit by branding $400,000,000 of it as unworthy to circulate among men! A very strange way of doing it. Rather the effect of the act was and is to enhance the value of the Government bond in the hands of the money power, and depreciate the currency that the Government compels the masses of the people representing the industries and producing classes, constituting nine-tenths of the whole people, to receive and accept as their share of the public credit, for the only legitimate purposes of Government credit, that is, the creation of capital, which constitutes the basis for the Government credit.

These gentlemen, not satisfied with their work, now propose to oppress these nine-tenths of the masses by taking from them a part of that which has been provided as the means by which they are enabled to live. If they succeed, the period may be much shorter than they anticipate when, by reason of the great reduction in the current resources of the Government, the destruction of the industries of the country, these bonds may not be so valuable in their hand as now. They may "kill the goose that lays the golden egg."

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the public credit, and how ought it to be considered by the people of this country? Why, sir, if you have a bond of the Government payable twenty years hence, and drawing but 5 per cent. interest, you say it is gold. But if you have a greenback of the Government, the Government and all the people are just as solemnly bound to pay it, and take care of it and keep it good, as they are the bond; yet by the legislation of the country it is not worth as much as the bond is in gold.

But it is said that gold is the "world's currency." What is the "world's currency?" What gives value to anything that circulates among the people of any country as the currency of that country? If it is a metallic currency, is it the metal? Or is it not the stamp that is placed upon it? Why, sir, I would have all Europe, and all the world besides, to understand, when they come to America, that our currency has all the attributes of money, and their currency must be brought to the standard of the greenback, just the same as they make us bring ours to their standard when we go to their respective countries. What ought we to say when they ask us by what authority we call this piece of paper five dollars? Our answer should be analogous to that of old Ethan Allen at Fort Ticonderoga, "By the authority of the American Congress and Almighty God." With such a stamp and with such security the greenback is the best currency in the world to-day. We have no fears of detriment to the country by an increase of its volume. Our people would hail the legal authority for such an increase, as the experience of the country indicates very clearly as being proper, as the children of Israel did the fall of the manna in the wilderness.

"The world's currency!" Why, sir, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] the other day, I think very fittingly, exposed that fallacy, when he instanced the fact that a man traveling from England to France, across the Channel, would have to convert his sovereigns into francs. We have had a very notable instance of this "world's currency." When the little unpleasantness between Germany and France was made up, you remember that Germany required the French to pay her a large sum of money. Now, the French had a specie currency—"the world's currency." Old President Thiers said to his secretary of the treasury, "We have the world's currency, the franc, with which to pay this indemnity to Germany." But says Bismarck, "No, sir; you do not; that is not 'the world's currency.' We have a 'world's currency' of our own here; and you have got to melt up your 'world's currency' and put it into our 'world's currency' before we receive it." "But," says President Thiers, "this is the 'world's currency,' and you must take it." I fancy I hear Bismarck say "Nix komm heraus." [Laughter.] Now that may not be very good German, but it is germane to this subject. And in order to pay the war debt the French had to take their "world's currency" and melt it into the "world's currency" of Prussia.

Another thing. They had a world's fair and exposition over there in Vienna last summer. And they had a "world's currency" there, too. But the curious part of it is that during that fair the greenbacks of the United States were worth more at Vienna than the currency of Austria, "the world's currency," and brought a premium. A friend of mine, who was over there, to whom I said, "What could you do with the greenbacks; could you get anything with them?" replied, "O, yes; I got a premium on them."

The world's currency of the United States, the greenback currency, is to-day worth more at Vienna and on the Rhine than the bond of Great Britain. Now, I think that is about good enough. It seems to me that the quality is all very well, and that we have no right to say, by legislation or otherwise, that the dollar of the United States in the shape of a greenback shall not be a dollar for all purposes.

But, Mr. Speaker, I know that in talking in this way I am outside of precedents, and I am glad of it.

Mr. KELLEY. But you are on the foundations of eternal truth.

Mr. BUNDY. It seems to me that as a people we have been following long enough the precedents set us in centuries gone by.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. BUNDY. I am speaking without notes and off-hand; besides that I am a "granger," and am opposed to middle-men, and therefore I decline to yield the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLOGG. If the gentleman would tell us whether he would have greenbacks for all time, never paying them off, I would be very glad.

Mr. BUNDY. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." You cannot get from greenbacks to specie, for the reason that you have not got the specie; and you never will have so long as you export it, as you have been doing for the last ten years.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the gentleman mean to say that we never should get there?

Mr. BUNDY. Ah! That is another thing. My idea is, Mr. Speaker, that in the progress of time this thing will regulate itself, just as our business interests have regulated themselves since the close of the war, and that we shall get back to specie payments by processes of nature, so to speak. Any spasmodic effort, any application of a violent remedy, will be a Cesarean operation, involving the life of the mother and the children at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, I was saying awhile ago that I am outside the line of precedents. Sir, it is a very easy thing to make a speech in favor of contraction and resumption. It is a very easy thing, and sounds very pretty to say, "Let us go back to specie payments;" for the writers on the subject are nearly all that way. The books that have been written on the subject have been written by men who were in the interest of the aristocracy of the country in which they were living. They were written in the interest of moneyed men, as against the laboring man and the masses of the people. I do not know that I can except from this remark any book on political economy that I know anything about. I admit that I have not read as much on this subject as some others; if I had I might have adopted their heresies.

The correct solution of this question, in my judgment, can only be reached by practical action, dictated by the surrounding and pressing exigencies and conditions of our own country, without being controlled by the precedents of countries and exigencies that have no sympathy or analogies for or with us. What other countries have done or may do may not at all be a guide for us, unless the conditions and exigencies were or are the same as ours.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman ought to except Henry C. Carey's works on political economy.

Mr. BUNDY. Not a single standard book in the schools, so far as I know, takes the right ground on this subject, because they have not admitted Mr. Carey yet, and they will not as long as they keep Adam Smith and Ricardo, and such works. I know but one professor in all the colleges of this country who seems to stand in the right position. He uses one of the common text-books in his classes, but at the same time tells his students all the while that its theories are all wrong, as applicable to our country. I mean Dr. L. D. McCabe, of Delaware, Ohio. The current theories on this subject have been put forth and advocated by men who have written in the interest of the upper classes, so to speak.

And, sir, how many volunteers we have coming now to Washington, and going before the Committee on Ways and Means, or the Committee on Banking and Currency, to tell them what ought to be done about this thing. The other day a gentleman from my own State had an audience before that committee and gave it as his opinion that there ought to be contraction. This gentleman came all the way from Cincinnati to tell the Committee on Banking and Currency that the true policy is to contract and get back to specie payments. Well, whom did he represent? He represented Third street. It is an easy thing for him to come here and tell the Committee on Banking and Currency that they should do that which, if done, would not only destroy the business interests of the country, but would multiply the paupers among us indefinitely.

Such men can come here and appear before our committees. But do you see here delegates from the mines or from the farms of the West? Are there here any representatives of those who dig in the soil or work under ground? O, no; they have no money; they cannot come. Are there deputations here from the one hundred and ten thousand men who are out of employment in the city of New York? Here and at the other end of the Capitol you will see fat, sleek gentlemen telling us what we ought to do about this question of banking and currency. Do you see any deputations here from the far West, where their corn is burned as fuel because it will not bear the cost of transportation to the sea-board? No, sir; for they have not the money to spare upon which to come, and they have no railroad passes. They are not here in force or out of force, Mr. Speaker. I think the aphorism of Bacon has been very strangely perverted in this country; instead of knowledge being power, money is power.

In such seasons of panic as we have had since September, $10,000 could set in motion more machinery and appliances to affect the public or legislative minds on the subject of the finances than $1,000,000 worth of other property would accomplish in the same time.

Money can and does establish newspapers and hires correspondents to fill them with communications in its interest; writes and publishes pamphlets, and sends lobbyists to the seats of the law-making power, thereby creating and crystallizing the most potent influences before other and more cumbrous property can move in the direction of its own interests. I do not complain of this, only referring to the difference in the capabilities of the two elements as facts.

Now, I would not antagonize capital and labor. They ought not to be antagonized. Capital and production must not be antagonized, and will not be unless the indiscreet friends of capital cause it to be done. Give each of them a fair chance. That is my position. Give us of the West, and of the South, and the Southwest, and the Northwest an equal chance with the East and the Middle States. Why, sir, I had some curiosity to analyze the vote given last Monday on the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON;] and the result of the analysis is very curious. All the Eastern States came in as a solid mass against the resolution; two-thirds of all the Middle States also were against it; but when you come to the South, the Southwest, the West, and the Northwest, you find that of the 135 votes for the resolution, 117 were cast by them, leaving only 18 yeas from the Eastern and Middle States, 13 of which were from Pennsylvania, 3 from New York, 1 from New Jersey, and 1 from Delaware. I will furnish the resolution referred to, the votes thereon, showing the yeas and nays, the number of those not voting, and the States to which they belong, together with the vote as recorded in the Journal of the House:

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the preamble and resolutions which I send to the desk be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Whereas by reason of the present monetary stringency and the insufficiency in the amount of circulating medium, the industries and commercial affairs of the country have been greatly depressed; and whereas by reason of said stringency the revenues of the Government have been largely diminished, in consequence whereof Congress has been asked to increase taxation to the amount of $42,000,000; and whereas until the recent panic the revenues were ample to meet the current expenses of the Government: Therefore,

"Resolved, That instead of levying additional taxes the true policy lies in the enactment of such a law or laws as will relieve such stringency and supply the means necessary to the business wants of the country, by increasing the circulating medium, thereby reviving business, increasing revenues, and thus avoiding the necessity of increasing the present rates of taxation or duties, or the imposition of additional taxes or duties.

"Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, instructed to prepare and report to the House, without delay, a bill for the purpose in the first resolution expressed, and that said committee have leave to report at any time."

Why is that so? Why, because, Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen of the East have been liberally provided for; and I do not blame them for voting just as they do in sustaining the interests of their people, and they must not blame us for voting as we do. Our rights are equal here upon this floor, and we propose to keep them so. In the apportionment of the banking capital the Eastern States have seventy millions in excess over that which their population and wealth entitle them to. The Middle States have about nine millions of excess. The Southern, Southwestern, the Western, and the Northwestern States have a deficiency of nearly eighty millions. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Eastern and Middle States insist upon contraction, or if they oppose an increase of the capital and currency, will they not, ought they not, to be willing to accept as a compromise the surrender of one-half of the excess of their authorized capital and currency to the Southern, Southwestern, Western, and Northwestern States, in proportion to the wealth and population of each? Then there would be an equitable division of the banking facilities among all the sections of our great country, according to the wealth and population of each. I have no hopes of effecting any such arrangement by the consent of the interested parties.

You of the Eastern and Middle States are provided for, and there will be no complaints on your part. Why should there be? You are fixed, and I could not dispose of your case better than by quoting from the language of the patriarch Job, when he said, "Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder?"

What we want in the first place is more currency; if we cannot get that, then an equitable division among the people of all sections of the country. We have no fears of any bad effects resulting from a legitimate and proper increase of the currency; and you having eighty millions more than your distributive share according to your wealth and population. We will be satisfied to have our deficiency made up to us. There must be something done to relieve the country. This state of things cannot and must not continue. If you have seventy-nine millions more than your wealth and population entitle you to, we are not afraid of any conjectured effects that would flow from making up our deficiency of near eighty millions, and the country will not suffer, but gain infinitely, by the operation.

I will here give an abstract of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency of November last, which will show in tabular form and in detail the population of the States by the census reports of 1870, the capital paid into the national banks in each of the States, the apportionment of each State according to population and wealth, outstanding authorized circulation of the banks in each State, the excess and deficiencies of each State, upon the basis of the population and wealth of each, and also the population and national banking capital, and what ought to have been the just apportionment, excess and deficiency to each group of States, Eastern, Middle, Southern, and Western States.

If we had a sufficient quantity such a proposition need not have been mooted. The question after all is, whether we have enough? How shall we determine it? The law of supply and demand determines it to a great extent. The rate of interest testifies in the case. Is it possible that the quantity of the currency is sufficient to make the necessary exchanges of the country when the holders of the currency demand and receive 12 to 18 per cent. interest for it? Shall not this medium of exchange be measured by the same laws which govern all other commodities as to the quantity on the market?

If we have abundance why are the producers and manufacturers compelled to pay such rates of interest?

I heard a singular argument the other day put forth by a statesman. This gentleman said that we had so much currency that its purchasing power was depreciated, and the lender therefore had to charge greater rates in order to make his legitimate relative profits. Mr. Speaker, that will not do. Apply his rule to any other commodity and you will see that it will not do. By his theory, if you wanted cheap horses, cattle, or other property, the obtaining the object would be by destroying one-half of the whole number.

I undertake to say another erroneous idea seems to afflict the minds of the contractionists, and that is that the gold dollar is the absolute standard of value. Why, sir, it has often been demonstrated in the history of our country that a bushel of wheat would as frequently buy two dollars in gold as that one dollar in gold would buy one bushel of wheat in the market. This, I believe, will hold good in all the great markets of the world. How do you account for it? Is the "standard of gold" measured by the value of the wheat, or by the quantity of each on the market? Why, sir, the wheat measures the value of the gold as much, and I think more, than the gold does the wheat. When we have large crops of wheat, the crop of money becomes small by comparison, or relatively, and vice versa.

The quicker we cut loose from all these old worn-out heresies, which can have no possible perfect, or even modified, application to us or to our modes of thought and acting, and start on the plain, common-sense path dictated by the spirit and genius of a free and independent people, the sooner will we get rid of the difficulties which beset us on every hand.

Mr. Speaker, the contractionists say, "Let us come back to specie payments at once." Why, sir, if we had a circulation of three hundred and fifty millions of bank-notes, and four hundred millions in greenbacks to redeem it with, and had a suspension of all in September and October—if the men in New York could make a corner on our whole currency and the redeeming agency at the same time, what would have become of the interests of the country if specie payments had prevailed in harmony with the old plans on that subject in this or any other country? Your paper currency and business would have been involved in irretrievable ruin, as in other crises.

We know, sir, what powers of combination these men possess. See how opportune for their interests this financial disaster came. See if there is not evidence of collusion and combination between the capitalists and money-lenders of Europe and America. Just at the time when crops were short in Europe; at a time when they would be compelled to import large quantities of agricultural products from America; just at the time when our cotton crops as well as the more than average quantities of the other crops were required in Europe to make up their deficiencies and we were about in return to receive the "world's currency," or its equivalent, in exchange for our surplus products, the combined money power of Europe and America "made the corner." The result was that our produce was stopped in transitu—the prices reduced more than 25 per cent. Had this not been done the exportable commodities would have gone forward, realizing full prices paid to our own people. The balance of trade might have turned in our favor, and the gold that we have been compelled to export annually to pay our debts abroad would have remained with us; and in time "specie payments" would have resumed of their own motion, and the interests of the country have been protected and saved.

But, sir, the effect of this combination has been to turn our workingmen out of employment, sending them adrift in every direction at the most trying and inclement season of the year. "Too much currency," you say. If we had enough, properly guarded and regulated, it would be impossible for the privateers to capture and corner it as they did. Can a corner be made upon the produce of the country except when under the influence of such panics? I think not. It has been tried in Chicago; but they cannot be maintained. Such curses are like chickens; they come home to roost, and the parties engaged are frequently involved in irretrievable ruin.

Mr. Speaker, on the question of the quantity of the currency, it seems to me, as I said before, that to state our case is a sufficient argument of it. If sufficient, why are we compelled to pay such dear rates for its use? But then, again, contemplate the difference between our condition and that of Great Britain, our banking capital and circulation twenty-seven dollars per capita, and theirs one hundred and five dollars, and the demands for its use in each country; our country stretching from the north pole to the equator, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, embracing forty million free, industrious (and ought to be a prosperous) people, and they would be prosperous if the legislation of the country favored all as much as it does part of our people—this vast area, embracing lands, forests, and mines of undeveloped and inexhaustible wealth, which could and would furnish five times our capital and circulation profitable avenues for investments and active operations in the development of our great and as yet undeveloped natural resources, capable of employing and sustaining five hundred million people. Great Britain, with her thirty-two million people, and one hundred and five dollars of banking capital and circulation each, covers an area not larger than one of the States of this Union, powerless to inaugurate an additional industry, those in operation far on the way to complete exhaustion, and with her great city of London, which, practically, is Great Britain for all commercial purposes, does not in fact need one-fourth the banking capital and circulation that we do. The Eastern States, with a part of the Middle States, may, as before stated, have a fair supply, for they are situated much like England is, without the undeveloped resources to set on foot new industries, and with the great cities of New York and Boston, which, through their clearing-houses, transact hundreds of millions daily on less than 4 per cent. in actual currency. Not so with us in the West, South, Northwest, and Southwest. Our sections, more sparsely settled, and denied by the Government our equal share of banking facilities, we have, in proportion to our needs, very limited facilities for transacting the business of our great producing region of the country.

But, Mr. Speaker, what has been the effect of our financial system of which this inconvertible and branded paper currency is so prominent a part, and which was adopted by the republican party? I do not refer to this matter in a partisan sense, only because the republican party was in power when it was adopted, and has sustained it since its birth. I am very glad to find so many of the friends of the proposition with me, from the South and West, of both parties. Sir, the country has advanced more in material wealth, and all the elements of civilization, since 1861, twelve years, than marked its progress in all the history of its past. The melting of the shackles off four million slaves, by the fervid heat of a fratricidal war, has not only resulted in their emancipation, but has stricken the shackles off thirty million white people. I have not the time to go into details, and have not the statistics present.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want to state a fact which is patent, and which can be seen, known, and read of all men everywhere—that under this policy of expansion, if you so call it, the United States has grown more in wealth and prosperity in the twelve years than it did in the whole seventy-one years of its previous existence. In 1860 all descriptions of property, including the estimated value of slavery, nearly four hundred millions, was estimated about $16,000,000,000. In 1870 the same description of property, with such additions as had been made in the decade, excluding slavery, (as it had been destroyed,) was estimated at nearly $30,000,000,000. The increase in the same ratio would indicate a grand total of more than $32,000,000,000 in 1873. These vast accumulations, Mr. Speaker, are the product of the laborers and citizens of the country who are now feeling so keenly the effect of the monetary panic. And, therefore, I say that the very best argument that can be adduced in favor of my theory of finance is to be found in your census tables demonstrating the unprecedented growth and prosperity of the country under this policy—more development and growth in twelve years than in seventy-one years before the adoption of this policy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that which I am specifically in favor of is this. In the first place I understand that the Committee on Banking and Currency have reported that the permanent quantity of greenbacks in the country shall be $400,000,000. I do not care to increase that description of currency just now. I am aware that here I will differ with some of the friends of expansion. There are those who believe that the entire circulation ought to be greenbacks. They may be right. But it seems to me that our present system has merits in it, and that it ought not to be abandoned unless for paramount considerations. It also occurs to me that our dual system is better than a sole system of any kind; that in the system of national banks regulated by law, the Government retains a sort of supervision that it could not very well do if greenbacks were to constitute the sole currency. It is true we would save money in the way of interest, but is it not also true that the people would lose largely in the way of local taxation? I take it that greenbacks are not subject to taxation by local or State governments in the hands of the holders, because they are a Government credit.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUNDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. For several years after greenbacks were first issued in 1862 they were subject to taxation. They were subject to a war tax I think as late as 1864, when they ceased to be the subject of taxation. Congress having yielded the right, might not greenbacks be made the subject of local taxation?

Mr. BUNDY. I am not a casuist in that particular, and hence do not know. But I think not, as a greenback has been determined by the State courts to be a token of Government credit, and hence not taxable. The courts in my State have decided that greenbacks, in the pockets of the individual, are not the subject of taxation at the time or on the day of the assessment. The Federal courts have affirmed these decisions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was not the decision made under a law enacted exempting them from taxation?

Mr. KELLEY. I must protest against the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] being interrupted. He has said over and over again that he has no notes, and does not wish to be diverted from the line of his argument.

Mr. KELLOGG. No one would have thought of interrupting him had not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] first interrupted him.

Mr. BUNDY. I have but a few more remarks to make on this branch of the subject. I hold that the volume of greenbacks ought to be at least $400,000,000, and fully justify the Secretary of the Treasury in emitting the reserve held in his vaults.

As to whether the national banks should be supplanted by the sole system of greenbacks or not is an open question with me. I was, and am still, in favor of the three sixty-five bond payable in lawful money, and converted at the option of the holder into currency; and that such bonds shall be held and treated by the national banks as their reserve in place of their own notes and greenbacks, thereby releasing the latter, giving them the power of mobility to circulate, which would add more than one hundred and twenty-five millions to the volume of the currency. I have been staggered a little in the practicability of issuing these bonds to take the place of currency, and to act as an element of elasticity to the currency. I was talking with a gentleman who seemed to understand better than I did the arts and powers of the New York operators. He expressed the opinion that in some way they would manage to get possession of and control these bonds when they wanted to make a corner in the money market, and therefore they would and could not be converted into currency, as contemplated by their friends. If this could be done I am not certain that I would be in favor of issuing such bonds, but had rather risk some other expedient to expand and impart elasticity to the currency. Mr. KELLEY, the author of the bill introduced by himself, on that subject, can probably dissipate any doubts I may have. If so, I shall favor his proposition.

I am in favor of another thing, and that is that the national banks shall be prohibited from paying interest on current deposits or daily balances, and that they shall not be compelled by law to keep a reserve of 25 per cent. of their deposits in the banks to pay depositors. Let the banks and depositors fight their own battles. As I said some time since, the banks of England only hold one hundred and sixteen millions in reserve on a line of deposits and circulation of $3,500,000,000, less than 4 per cent. of the aggregate. There is no reason why our banks should be compelled to hold more.

In conclusion, we want a sufficient currency, and want it good. The latter attribute we have secured in a greater measure and for a longer period than any country ever did, following so closely upon a destructive war. The better way, and in my judgment the only way, to appreciate its quality is to enlarge its quantity to such a volume as, if endowed with the requisite elastic powers, will keep all the productive industries of the country in active and profitable operation; for from these and these alone must come all the means to pay the interest on our public debt, the pensions of the widows and orphans, and ordinary expenses of the Federal Government. The full and successful tide in the operations of these will give us the resumption of specie payments that will come to stay. The converse will buy bankruptcy of the people and Government, and ultimate practical, if not formal and actual, repudiation. The untarnished credit of the Government at home and abroad can only be maintained through the prosperity of its people in all the departments of their industries.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this so-called "civil-rights bill," the Representatives of North Carolina have thus far occupied but little of the time of the House, and myself none at all, as I preferred to hear fully the advocates of the measure before giving my views. But a sense of duty will not permit me to remain silent longer on a subject so vitally important to the people of the entire South. The Northern States, whose people are nearly all of one race, will be little affected by this measure; and their Representatives here, knowing little of the practical difficulty of maintaining free government and social harmony among a heterogeneous population like ours, may think it a light thing to indulge in this theoretical and fanciful legislation, and thus to thrust a new factor into the great and novel problem which we of the South have to solve. But that spirit of comity and mutual good-will which should exist among all the sections of a common country, now irrevocably bound to a common destiny, ought to induce our northern countrymen to hearken with patience and deference to the protest which comes up against this measure from all those thirteen States whose welfare it most deeply concerns—States which, it is true, you lately overwhelmed on the field by your superior numbers, but whose heroism in the struggle and whose bearing under defeat entitle them to the respect of their brave adversaries. So important were those States in area, climate, soil, and resources that a dozen years ago you declared that their continuance in the Union was necessary to the "nation's life," as you phrased it. If that were so, are not their peace and prosperity in the Union essential to the nation's healthy life? If by an unwise policy you keep that half of the body-politic morbid and disordered, will not the nation—like my late constituents and supporters, the Siamese twins, after one was paralyzed—drag out but a diseased, enfeebled, and miserable existence?

The bill under discussion reads as follows:

A bill to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whoever, being a corporation or natural person, and owner or in charge of any public inn; or of any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required; or of any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight; or of any cemetery, or other benevolent institutions, or any public school supported, in whole or in part at public expense or by endowment for public use, shall make any distinction as to admission or accommodation therein of any citizen of the United States because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 for each offense; and the person or corporation so offending shall be liable to the citizens thereby injured in damages, to be recovered in an action of debt.

SEC. 2. That the offenses under this act and actions to recover damages may be prosecuted before any territorial, district, or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes at the place where the offense was charged to have been committed as well as in the district where the parties may reside, as now provided by law.

The following amendment is proposed to be submitted by Mr. MOREY:

Add to the end of section 2 the following:

And all of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication," passed April 6, 1866, relating to the enforcement of civil rights, with the penalties therein provided, are made applicable in the prosecution of offenses under this act.

Whether Congress has the right, under the Constitution, to enact such a law, (which I do not believe,) or whether such right pertains solely to the States, (which is my opinion,) I will not stop to discuss, for not only has that question been fully debated already, but even if the right of Congress to pass this bill were undoubted, I should still oppose it on account of its ruinous inexpediency. My remarks will be confined altogether to the detection and exposure of the false political, social, and ethnological principles upon which this proposed legislation is based, and the injurious results necessarily consequent upon its adoption. If my treatment of the subject should seem somewhat speculative and discursive, I trust it may be pardoned, and attributed to my desire to avoid following in a beaten track and repeating what has already been said.

We have heard much in this debate about equality—the equality of men and of races of men. That kind of rhetoric has been fashionable in America for a century past. The illustrious Jefferson appears to have inaugurated it when he penned the celebrated sentence, "All men are born equal." That sentence was analyzed twenty-five years ago by another famous statesman of our country, and shown to be not only not true, but to contain more error and untruth than has ever been embodied, perhaps, in the same number of English words. It is a sentiment which may serve very well, and often has served well, as the war-cry of revolutionists, but calm philosophy, ay, plain common sense, smiles at its absurdity. "All men born equal." Why, sir, no two men are born equal, or ever live to become equal. In face, in form, in fortune, in intellect, in everything, each man is unlike every other. Not equality, but infinite inequality and variety, is the law of this universe. It has been said that "Shakespeare never repeats." Such was the compass of his genius, that every effort of his mind evolved a new idea. Does God, then, repeat? No, sir. Each thought emanating from the All-perfect mind is a new thought, and each act a new creation. He made the oak to battle with storms, and the daisy to shelter underneath; the eagle to soar above the clouds, and the mocking-bird to sing in the thicket. All nature is full of contrasts and unlikenesses. And not only does this variety pertain to the natural world, but in that higher realm to which faith points us, "one star differs from another star in glory." So that from the grains of sand and the rocks, upward through the living, the animate, the intelligent, the spiritual, the angelic existences, to the very throne of God, all being is one grand chain of progressive and successive links, whereof there are no two of them equal or alike.

The fanatical spirit which threatens utterly to dominate this country seeks to reduce everything and everybody to the plane of mediocrity and a common average. It hates superior excellence. It is a leveling spirit, leveling downward and not upward. In the eyes of these so-called universal-equality men no doubt the forests look deformed, because the oak, and elm, and pine overshadow the minor shrubs; and the starry heavens appear to them imperfect, because Sirius, and Arcturus, and Aldebaran shine out proudly eminent among their little companions. And these men would think it an improvement if they could bring down all the trees to the level of the black-jack, and all the stars to the size of the north star. But fortunately these things are beyond their power, being protected by a constitution which our radicalists and higher-law men cannot, and therefore do not, violate and trample on. But there is one thing which these fanatical levelers might do, and to be consistent they ought to do it at once. Above your head, Mr. Speaker, I see the image and presentment of the eagle—our national emblem. In the name of equality, sir, I demand what business has he there? He is a monarch—the king of birds. He is no fit emblem for us in these times—no proper representative of the prevalent ideal. I suggest that he be torn down, as the French tore down the monogram of the Emperor. Do you ask me what bird could with propriety be put in his place? The crow, sir. He is a bird of medium size, and therefore embodies well the idea of the levelers. His plumage is of the favorite color, so popular with the dominant party. [Laughter.] I will not—because it would seem ungracious—carry out the parallel in its details, and show how fit an emblem for the times he is in other respects, such as his thieving propensities, and the like. [Laughter.] I think what has been suggested is sufficient to satisfy you that if this bill is to pass, the so-called reformers should at least amend it, by providing that the eagle shall henceforth come down from his proud perch, and the crow be exalted in his stead. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] seemed himself to abandon the idea of the absolute equality of men; for he formulated his doctrine in these words: "That every man has the right to become the equal of another, if he can." In some sense that may be conceded as true. But that is not what this bill proposes. It does not propose to leave the negro to be the equal of the white man, "if he can;" for our laws amply provide for that now. by opening to the negro every avenue to progress and emolument which other men possess. But this bill seeks to make the negro equal to the white man by pulling the white man down to the level of the negro; by providing that the white man shall be nothing, have nothing, and enjoy nothing, unless he sees to it that the negro shall be, have, and enjoy precisely the same thing

Sir, since it is impossible for any one man to be equal to or like any other man, is it not more philosophical to say that such a thing can be no proper object of human effort or ambition? Our rights are limited by our duties, and our duties are measured by our capabilities. "To whom much is given, of him shall be much required." I lay this down as the true doctrine—that every man has the right, and is bound by the duty, to fill the sphere and move in the orbit to which God and nature have assigned him, as indicated by his peculiar natural endowments, which, being different in each individual and in each race, point out for each a different part to perform. If we could change this, and compel all to revolve in one and the same orbit, we should overthrow eternal laws and reduce the world back to chaos.

In speaking of the characteristics of the negro, I do not mean any disrespect to him. I respect all men as men and as the children of a common Father, and I trust I have a heart to wish well to all and to do good to all. But, sir, the negro is not a black white man. He is a different man, with different talents, different duties, and different rights. In saying this I do not deny unity of origin and a common ancestry to the human family. I believe in these things, because such seems the plain teaching of that Book which southern men generally rely upon as the embodiment of perfect truth.

Do you ask me, then, whence sprang the huge dissimilarities which mark the several branches of this common family, and which have thus distinguished them for ages? That is a question which has puzzled the brains of scientists for centuries, and it would be presumptuous in me to attempt its solution. But we are told in the Book of books that there was a period when "the whole world was of one language and of one lip, (as the Hebrew has it,) and while they were engaged in building a lofty tower, as a common rallying point, for the purpose of preventing their own dispersion, this design of theirs being opposed to the design of the Creator, He came down and, by an exertion upon the whole race at once, of that omnipotent power by which He first made man out of the dust of the earth, divided them up into tribes, and nations, and races, and scattered them abroad over the world, giving to each division a different speech, and probably, at the same time, a specific physical type; for that great changes were wrought in man's physical constitution about that period is proven by the fact that previously men lived nine hundred years, while ever since then the measure of their days is three-score years and ten. But this is a digression, and this is not the time or place to follow up the idea. If we were in a lyceum discussing ethnology, I would enlarge upon and fortify it. Here I merely throw out the hint, to be laughed at by fools, but to be pondered by those who realize the mystery and (as Carlyle says) "the deep tragedy of human life."

But, sir, no matter how the races originated, they do exist and are not alike. The negro is different from the white man. In some things he excels the white man. He has much music in his soul. He can outsing, outdance, outlaugh, and outfrolic the white man. He is more docile, more self-satisfied, more imitative, more affectionate, more passionate, and perhaps more naturally eloquent than the white man. He is the world's "merry-andrew." He is the world's star actor on the comic stage. Such are the endowments of the negro; and some of them are noble qualities, and by no means show that the negro may not fill a useful and important place in the world's future civilization. But when you come to the grand tragic and heroic parts in the drama of humanity, where will, force, courage, forethought, the sense of masterdom, and the instinct of dominion are required to shine, the negro fails. Despite all that we have heard on that subject, the negro is no fighter. To prove that he is, we are pointed to the records of the recent war between the States. Yes; infuriated with whisky, he was brought to the scratch a few times, only to be sacrificed without result.

Mr. WALLS rose.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. WALLS. Did you ever meet the negro on the battle-field?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sometimes; and whipped him easily too. It was my business for four years on the battle-field to meet all comers without regard to "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has given us a glowing account of how he sent in a column of three thousand negroes to take a redoubt at Newmarket Heights, protected, he says, by two lines of strong abatis, and manned by one thousand of Lee's veterans. Relying solely on the weight of his column and the energy of the charge, he says he uncapped the muskets of his men to prevent their firing. And he says they took the redoubt with a loss of five hundred and forty-three killed, and that the thousand rebels were so frightened—of course they were not hurt, as his men had no caps on their muskets—that they did not stop running for four miles. Now, far be it from me to charge that gentleman with intentional or conscious exaggeration. I have always thought it was cruel and unjust in Prince Hal to accuse Falstaff of lying when he recounted his fight with the supposed travelers on Gadshill. I have always believed that Sir John did really see eleven men in buckram, though it was dark, and only Hal and Poins were there. Allowance must be made, sir, for excitement of fancy in combatants rehearsing their own exploits and "fighting their battles o'er again." [Laughter.]

Being absent, wounded, at the date spoken of by the gentleman from Massachusetts, of course I cannot speak of the facts from personal observation. But from many comrades who were thereabouts at the time I have always understood that when Ord's column of white troops surprised and took Fort Harrison, which was the center and key of our rebel position, whatever posts to the left of it were given up at all were abandoned at once under orders and without serious resistance, their isolated situation rendering them untenable. A handful of skirmishers, moved by the instinct of old fighters, may have given a parting shot or two as they were ordered away.

Four or five were usually wounded in battle to one killed outright. If five hundred and forty-three were killed in that negro column, two thousand or twenty-five hundred others must have been wounded; so that it is really wonderful that the small squad left should have been able to terrify so thoroughly with their uncapped muskets that thousand old powder-burnt rebels! There does not appear any good reason for their running in such wild dismay; and no one knows better than the gentleman from Massachusetts that the men he used to meet in battle were not given to running away without a good reason.

Mr. Speaker, it appears now that we men of the South must have been under a strange delusion. Those serried lines which used to charge us with such terrible vigor looked like white men to us; and if the field ever remained in our hands, we always found that the slain heroes who strewed the ground so thickly were, alas! our white American brothers—all honor to them; all honor to the heroic dead on both sides who laid down their lives for their principles! We thought then that the masses of heroic white troops led by Grant, and Sherman, and McClellan, and Meade, and their compeers, were the men we ought to dread; but we learn now that it was the hero from Massachusetts and his colored troops that we had most reason to fear. Wonderful that we should thus have been destroyed by that which then caused us so little apprehension!

I am told that the records of the war show that only some fifteen hundred negro troops were killed in the entire four years. That fact alone speaks volumes. We know that a single corps of white troops—Federal and Confederate alike—sometimes lost that many killed in one battle. Meagher's brigade of heroic Irishmen must have lost a large fraction of that number at Fredericksburgh. There was fighting indeed. And though I was their adversary there, yet in honor of their matchless gallantry I pray that the turf on their graves may be as green forever as their own Emerald Isle.

Look at one more fact. Nearly three years before the war ended the four million negroes of the South knew that its result involved the question of their liberty. Yet while the continent shook with the earthquake of war, and nobody was at home but old men and boys to keep them in order, those negroes seized no weapon and struck no blow. I do not mention it as a reproach to them. It merits rather the thanks of southern men. I mention it only to show that the negro is not like the white man. What race of white men would have remained quiet under the same circumstances? When the proclamation of emancipation was issued the peculiar patrons of the negro in the North expected him to rise and throw off the yoke and butcher our wives and children; and in the abundance of their philanthropy and humanity they hoped so, too. The result showed how little they knew of the negro character; and their whole policy since, ay, this very bill to-day, shows how little they still understand him.

Sir, the negro may excel in minor qualities, but he is lacking in those peculiar endowments of vigor, will, and force of character which give dominion in this rough world of ours. Wherefore it was said that "Japhet shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant;" and the white man has come all the way from Europe, and the Indian has been dispossessed, and the negro has been brought from Africa, that the prediction might be fulfilled here in America. Sir, the negro is a clinging parasite. He looks up to others as his superiors. He is an inveterate servant. Free him how you will, enfranchise him as you may, he still waits for guidance and submits to command. In all the Southern States to-day he is but the tool of political shysters, who prate of his bodily freedom while they enslave his soul. Even here on this floor (and I mean no disrespect to any fellow-member by this remark) he does nothing, he says nothing, except as he is prompted by his managers; even here he obeys the bidding of his new white masters, who move him like a puppet on the chess-board.

The old system of negro slavery, as once existing in all the States, is forever dead and buried, and I have no tears to shed over its grave. I always believed it would come to an end before a great while, because I saw it was changing; and whatever thing changes must die. There is in the universe but One eternal, because there is but One immutable. Sir, slavery had fulfilled its mission, which was to civilize and christianize an originally savage race. It was God Almighty's school to which he sent the negro to be trained and developed. Practically, and as human nature is, it seemed the only system by which he could have been protected, fed, clothed, and cared for, while gradually acquiring civilization from the more cultivated race in whose presence he dwelt. This line of remark may seem digressive, but I adopt it in defense of my native South. She is often derided for her slow material progress in the past, and her late social system is denounced as the cause. Sir, I have heard these revilings of my people till my spirit burns within me.

I stand here to-day as an independent and fearless vindicator of the South. I hope I shall not be charged with improper sectionalism in so doing. Other parts of the country feel free to talk of themselves here. When we were talking of the centennial celebration yesterday we heard Pennsylvania boast of the glorious events that have made her renowned; and Massachusetts took up the refrain and sounded her own praises, too. They had a right to do so. But surely if it is consistent with national sentiment for some States to boast their renown, it cannot be wrong for other States to defend themselves against unjust reproaches.

It was not slavery, sir, which kept the South back; it was the presence there of four millions of men who came to us at first utterly untrained savages; and these we had to govern, train, and improve, as best we might. Herein it was our mission to expand our moral and material forces, and it entailed upon us great burdens; for these men were awkward and unskillful laborers, whereby our efforts were of necessity confined to the coarser and more primitive kinds of human industry; and thus we suffered infinite material loss. The North, with her skilled and educated laborers and artisans, was at liberty to devote herself to the more complex and refined industrial pursuits, with consequently higher profits and more rapid growth in affluence. To have freed our slave laborers, and set about directly educating them in schools, was, for many reasons, a practical impossibility. If we had freed them much earlier than they were set free, and thrown them on their own resources, they would have perished in their helplessness. When they were freed, immensely advanced as they then were in practical knowledge of the arts of civilized life beyond their original condition, consider what immense cost and labor it has required on the part of this great Government, through the machinery of the Freedmen's Bureau and other agencies, to hold that race up till it got able to stand alone.

While the North, therefore, can point to her great cities, her wide commerce, and her abounding wealth, as the results of her efforts, may not the South truthfully say that the grand work of civilizing and elevating a whole race has been mainly hers? I do not claim, nobody pretends, that the great and beneficent results which, under Providence, we have thus wrought out were directly and consciously aimed at by us with deliberate purpose. In our dealings with the Africans we were, of course, mainly prompted by those ordinary motives of self-interest which move human nature everywhere; just as were the Yankee slavers who deported the negro from his native land and sold him to us. He owes none of us, North or South, many thanks. But I do maintain that his removal from Africa, and temporary subjection in this country, have been the divinely appointed means of his civilization and Christianization. These things seem so obvious to me that I content myself with simply stating them and leaving them for the reflection of all candid minds.

Neither ought the negro, or his soi-disant friends, to indulge perpetual bitterness, as if in all those events any wrong or any strange thing has happened to him. We may speculate upon the absolute right of every human being, under all circumstances, to liberty and self-control. These are fine abstractions. But the order of nature and of Providence, which is practical, seems to be that every man, every nation, and every people shall first pass through a stage of subjection and pupilage under some superior authority before arriving at maturity and enfranchisement. Each individual man passes through this stage of youth and subordination to his parents before he becomes of age. The leading of Israel into Egypt and into bondage was as wonderful and as necessary as their exodus therefrom. And as for nations, Spain, France, England, and the United States, and all others, I believe, first went through a period of dependence on some superior power or mother country before they reached independence and autonomy. The negro race, therefore, in being required first to serve and to be protected, and to learn, has only obeyed a law of human development, universal in its application.

Looking at what has been done for him, the negro has perhaps done less, as yet, for himself and the world than any other man in history. In his own land he has always been and still is a savage. Against his own will, the English and Yankee slavers stole him from Africa and sold him into southern servitude, and as soon as they had done so and got the money, began to roll up the whites of their eyes over the sin of slavery and to plot for his freedom. Against his will, the southern master trained him to regular labor and civilized habits, and gradually fitted him for liberty. Then in a grand conflict of arms among white men, in which he took no important part, he was freed. Afterward white men, voluntarily, without any effort of his, enfranchised him, made him a voter, and empowered him to hold office. As a freeman and voter he has put bad men in power, made suffrage a farce, destroyed public credit, ruined States, and disgraced republican institutions; and the return he makes is to clamor for more power and more privileges that he may further blight and mildew and waste our general welfare and prosperity. Is it not time to call a halt in this wild, negro-toting legislation? Is it not best to content ourselves with the ample guarantees which have been provided to protect the negro in his rights of life, liberty, and property, and set to work to see if we can save the institutions of this country, the good name of republican government, and the cause of human rights throughout the world?

France and Spain, our earliest allies, led by our example, have both, since 1789, struck many a resounding blow for liberty and popular institutions. But both, being recently freed from tyrants and given a choice of their destiny, seem to be retrograding back to monarchy, and inviting again the yoke of the despot. Why is this? It is because our example no longer cheers and encourages them. When they look this way they see South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, under so-called republican governments, crushed, despoiled, oppressed, and ruined—all this the work of the negro and his baser allies. Thus our example rivets chains on the necks of the nations.

Central and South America and Mexico find it impossible to establish good and stable governments. They breed revolutions and disorders as putrefying carcasses breed worms. It is because they are mongrel nations. They have no unity of race, interest, or sympathy; no common aspiration, no concord, no cohesion. Still, in pursuit of a vain and crazy theory of universal equality, born from the brains of immeasurable fools, you propose to follow in their footsteps and mongrelize half this nation, thereby rendering its healthy life impossible. Is it not time to call a halt?

It is impossible to undo what has been done, and nobody proposes to attempt that now, nor ever, unless by common sense and common consent and by peaceable means. But we can avoid going further on the down-hill road. Sir, it is time to recur to the doctrine in which is bound up the salvation of this country—the doctrine that this is the white man's land and ought to be a white man's government. I wish I had time to review the record of the great leaders of the radical party in the first few years after the war, and show how indignantly they then spurned the idea of making the negro a suffragan and political power in this country. They have long since gone beyond their scruples then. Party greed and ambition drove them on; and the same motive pushes them still on to propose this last and most ruinous of all their measures. If any happy future remains for this country, it must soon be delivered from that party and its reckless policy. This, sir, I repeat, is the white man's land, and he is responsible for its welfare. The temple of liberty founded here, and toward which all the downtrodden nations turn their faces to pray for deliverance, is committed to his charge. Let all the gentiles come, if they list—Chinese, Indian, Malay, African—and worship, and be amply and chivalrously protected while they worship in its outer courts; but the consecrated priest who ministers at the altar should be only the white man.

In my opinion this is not the permanent home of the negro. He is sojourning here as a school-boy under a course of tuition. He will graduate after awhile and leave school. He is not increasing in numbers. By the census reports, the African race in this country, during every decade before the last, increased on an average about 22 per cent.; during the ten years from 1860 to 1870, half of which period the negroes were in their former state of servitude, they gained 9.7 per cent. only, much less than half the former rate. We may infer, then, that the 9.7 per cent. was gained before 1865, and that from then to 1870 (under freedom) they increased none, but rather declined in numbers. The overshadowing white race is increasing rapidly in the land. In any event, then, the negro will in course of time be reduced to comparative insignificance. But for the present he is here in sufficient numbers, and makes up a sufficient fraction of the population in thirteen States, to be a tremendous hinderance to the harmony and progress of the South, if this kind of legislation is to prevail. But in proportion as the negroes become educated and their pride and self-respect are developed, they will feel they are in a land where, in spite of all laws and pretenses, they are looked upon as pariahs and inferiors, and they will pine for a country where they can be the real, not merely the nominal, peers of all. Then will come the voluntary exodus; whether to Central America, or Cuba, or Africa (more probably) to carry back civilization and the gospel to their fatherland, where the white man cannot carry it, I will not venture to speculate, for the womb of the future yet holds these things.

Mr. Speaker, these ideas of mine may seem novel, and my utterance of them in this place and on this occasion may appear extraordinary. I desire it may be distinctly understood that no individual and no party is responsible for what I have said except myself only. But I have carried out my purpose not to go over ground already trodden in this debate; and I have offered these suggestions, also, with design, that I might aid, if possible, in stemming the tide of fanaticism and mongrelism, which, if it should continue to advance, would ultimately sweep over our whole land and destroy every vestige of its former beauty and glory.

You have heard how this bill, if passed, will destroy our southern free schools. Not only is that true; it is true, also, that it will destroy the white republican party in the South. If I desired only party advantage, and not the welfare of the people of my country, I would wish you to pass this bill; for no respectable white man in my country is in favor of it; all are bitterly against it, and all will desert you if you pass it. But the evils which this bill would entail on us are too great a price to pay for any mere party success; and I therefore hope if it comes to a vote it may be voted down.

If you destroy our reviving free schools what is to become of us? And especially what is to become of the orphans of our soldiers? The negroes will fare better than they. Private schools supported by northern donations, by Friends' societies, by liberal contributions from negro sympathizers everywhere, dot our hills, and are filled with negro children. I do not complain of this; I rejoice at it; for I want all educated, by whatever means. I am an enthusiastic friend of universal education. It is of vital importance to the South that her newly enfranchised race should be well instructed. But our poor white soldiers' orphans are forgotten. No heart has a pulsation for them, except the hearts of their poverty-stricken living comrades. We are striving to build up the ruined foundations, and again to consecrate the moldering shrines of learning for their benefit; but in step the misguided negro and his, perhaps, well-meaning but mistaken patrons, and say we shall not do so unless we admit him there too, despite what we know is for his good and ours; and notwithstanding we everywhere provide for him out of our free bounty (for we pay all the taxes) exactly equal, though separate, privileges of education. If this shall be forced on us in spite of our protest, surely the curse of Heaven, in response to the orphan's cry, will smite the wicked, besotted, reckless rulers of this country.

The masses of the negroes of the South do not desire this enforced association in churches, in graveyards, hotels, schools, and elsewhere. They know full well, especially, that too intimate intermingling of the young will deprave our children and corrupt theirs. It is the idle, mulatto, paper-collared gentry, who hang around the street-corners and study how to live without that faithful industry to which our worthy colored men of the South devote themselves, who keep up this agitation. In North Carolina, as in the other Southern States, the whites and blacks are living together in amity and concord. In politics only do they differ. In regard to every other matter the black man goes to his old white master for counsel as to his surest, faithfulest, and most honorable friend. Has he a little money to lay up? "Old master" is his most trusted savings-bank. Is he about to make a trade? "Old master" is his most judicious adviser. Is he in trouble? He flies for protection to "old master." Is he in court and his reputation, the all-important question, involved? "Old master" is there ready to swear for him and stand by him when everybody else knows he is unworthy. He was formerly faithful to "old master," and "old master" is still faithful and partial to him. Such is our universal experience in the South. And natural laws are gradually settling all questions concerning the proper social relations between the two races on a practical and reasonable basis. Why, then, come in with your theories and experiments, and out of mere wantonness disturb our peace? Shall we never have done with this empirical legislation? Shall we never have done with this endangering of our social and political machinery by subjecting it continually to new and unnecessary strains? Why not leave time to crystallize the heterogeneous elements and solidify and beautify the fabric of our marvelously strange and novel southern civilization?

But some one may say, "If the negroes do not desire it, the law will be a nullity, and will give you no trouble." Ah! but there will always be restless and ill-intentioned individual negroes to thrust in the apple of discord among us. Especially will there always be base white men to prompt them to do so if they need prompting.

In conclusion, I earnestly appeal to the majority here to spare us, under all our misfortunes, the untold evils of this ill-devised measure. However you may receive the declaration, I do aver that we of the South mean well by the negro, we mean well by you, we mean well by the whole country. By our votes in favor of the centennial celebration at Philadelphia, we have shown our interest in the common national glory. By our recent support of extraordinary aid for the outfit of the Navy, in apprehension of difficulty with a foreign power, we have proved our loyal purpose to assist in maintaining the national honor and our readiness to march with you in every future emergency under the "old flag." We have been sorely tried, sorely humiliated. Crushing defeat on the field above all things tries the manhood of a people. We can, however, recuperate from that when we remember that it was not Englishmen, nor Frenchmen, nor Prussians, but it was only our fellow-Americans in superior force who did or could thus overwhelm us. But try us no further; trample on us no more; sport with our miseries no longer. Else you will break the spirit of a generous race, you will quench their manly hope, you will obliterate their pride and ambition, you will paralyze their patriotism, and you will doom one-half of this glorious land to perpetual blight, despair, and desolation.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed "this cruel war was over," and that we had entered upon an era of peace, prosperity, and future success as a nation. I had supposed that after the sad experience of more than five years, after we had sought to heal the wounds the war had made, after we had passed amnesty bills, and, as we thought, had entered upon the smooth, quiet road of future prosperity, we would meet on a common level in the halls of Congress, and that no longer would we brood over the past; that we would strike out a new line of policy, a new national course, and thus succeed in laying broad and deep the foundations of the future welfare of this country; that every man, of every race, of every section of this country, might strike hands and go forward in national progress.

I regret, however, that it again becomes my lot to answer a member from a neighboring State—North Carolina. It was my misfortune a few Saturdays ago to have to answer a gentleman from the same State [Mr. VANCE] in relation to strictures upon my race. I regret that it becomes my duty again, simply in defense of what I regard as a right—in defense of the race to which I belong—to meet the arguments of another gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] to show, if I can, their fallacy, and to prove they are not correct.

The gentleman starts out by saying that if we pass the pending civil-rights bill it may indeed seem pleasant to the northern people, but to his section, and to the South, it will be death. I do not think he is correct, for the reason that they have in the South suffered a great many more terrible things than civil rights, and still live. I think if so harmless a measure as the civil-rights bill, guaranteeing to every man of the African race equal rights with other men, would bring death to the South, then certainly that noble march of Sherman to the sea would have fixed them long ago. [Laughter.]
